

$2.50 a year.

Entered at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., at Second Class Mail Rates.

Copyrighted in 1881 by BEADLE AND ADAMS.

August 2, 1881.

NO. 90. VOL. IV. PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY BEADLE AND ADAMS, 98 WILLIAM ST., N. Y. PRICE, 5 CENTS

The Author's Daughter.

BY MARY HOWITT.

CHAPTER I.

MR. FRANK LAWFORD offended his family by three things. He turned author; he adopted liberal opinions in politics; he married a poor and nameless wife. Any one of those would have been bad enough, according to the hereditary notions of the Lawford family; but all these combined in one person was an unimaginable delinquency which the Lawfords could not forgive. But in order that our reader may have a more definite idea of this family, which had considered itself par excellence, sans reproche, we must go back to the time of Peter Lawford, the old squire.

Peter Lawford, and his ancestors before him, had been members of the squirearchy of Leicestershire for some hundreds of years. The chancel vault was full of the bones of the Lawfords, male and female; and the church walls were covered with monumental tablets in marble and brass, commemorating their virtues and their greatness. The Lawfords of the fifteenth century endowed the grammar school; the Lawfords built the almshouses; the Lawfords had given, and still gave doles of beef and food to the poor at Christmas; they had always sat on the magisterial bench; they were in all trusts of bridges and turnpike roads for their part of the county. Lawfords also had sat in Parliament; they had served their king and country in the army and on sea; and, according to their belief, they served God also, by providing out of their own family a Lawford to occupy the living of Lawford, which, of course, was in their gift—a comfortable way it was of serving God, for the living had always been a good one, and, at the time of our story, amounted to £300 a year. But whatever the Lawfords of former times had been as to wealth, Peter Lawford, when he came into possession of the estate, found that its revenues were somewhat en-numbered. Peter was the second son, and had been brought up to the law, for which he always entertained the highest regard; holding it as his firm opinion that, had fate left him to pursue his own course, he should have risen to the highest eminence. But fate made a country gentleman of him; and as it is a much easier and safer thing to regret the loss of greatness than to achieve it, Peter sat down contentedly on the broad lands of Lawford, to try to rid himself of the incumbrances which he never expected to find. The older Lawford had been a speculator before the true time for profitable speculation began, and therefore won for himself the character of insanity, because he laid down in his park an infant railroad, on which he had labored hard to perfect self-propelling carriages. He built velocipedes and constructed balloons, but, poor man, succeeded in nothing. He was one of those men with glimmerings of truth before the age is prepared to receive it; precursors of discoveries on the very verge of their birth. Had Mr. Lawford lived fifty years later he would have made his fortune and benefited society; as it was, he impoverished his family estate, and gained the reputation to himself of being brimful of crochets, if not actually insane; and, what was still more disastrous, lost his life by the falling of a heavy beam, which had been inadequately fastened for the support of some ponderous machinery.

The world said that Mr. Peter Lawford, now the head of the family, was a strong-minded man; he believed so himself, say, as we have hinted before, he had the highest possible idea of his own abilities, and in settling down on the estate resolved to clear off all incumbrances, and never to marry but with a woman of substance. It is wonderful what credit Peter's mode of action gained for him in the world; he was the very model of prudence and practical wisdom; he was an oracle at quarter sessions where his law knowledge really stood him in stead. He was counsellor both to old and young, and soon found that not only did he stand high among fathers and uncles, and brothers and nephews, but among all ladies whether married or single. Having enjoyed all his triumph for ten long years, he all at once took it into his head to think about being married. Perhaps he might be a little stimulated to this by hearing one certain May morning that no less than six ladies of his acquaintance were to be married that summer. Ah, poor Peter, and one of the six, the very Miss Rutherford, the belle of the county, about whom he had been thinking for these last four years. Without exactly knowing what was his exact train of thought, we can only say that upon that very morning Peter rode over to the Rutherfords to ascertain his fate.

He found the brother of the young lady at home, and asked immediately from him if the report of his sister's approaching marriage was really true. Mr. Rutherford replied that he believed so, that he hoped so, but that the marriage settlements were not yet drawn.

Lawford walked up and down the room, as men do whose minds are agitated, made one or two ineffectual attempts to speak, and then resolutely mastering his feelings, begged that Mr. Rutherford would never betray the emotion which he witnessed; that from the bottom of his soul he wished nothing but the happiness of his amiable sister; that he had wished to clear his estate of the incumbrances with which his unfortunate brother had burdened it—he had hoped in a year or two—that it was a very painful thing to him—that his friend would understand him—and now the report of Miss Rutherford's approaching marriage had reached him. He had ridden over to ascertain the truth—and now, of course, he had nothing more to say. He offered his friend his hand, and apparently much affected, was about to leave the room.

"My good fellow," said Rutherford, "this is unfortunate—but you must not go thus. Sit down, I will say a word to you in confidence. Of this Colonel Wynn I know little, of his family, still less; he is an acquaintance which my wife and Alice made last winter at Bath. You, on the contrary, are an old friend—our families have been connected by marriage, and I will candidly tell you that I would rather that Alice had married you than any other man I know."

Lawford's countenance brightened. "Might he understand," he asked, "that the young lady herself entertained any sentiment of regard towards him?"

Mr. Rutherford refused to give a definite answer to that question, but added that if his friend were inclined to try his luck, he could honestly tell him that with all his heart he wished him success.

On that very day, as a matter of course, Mr. Lawford offered hand and heart to the fair Alice Rutherford. The lady blushed, wept, looked lovelier than ever; spoke of the awkward position of her affairs; of Colonel Wynn whom she esteemed as a friend, of his violent temper, of her dread of fearful consequences; wept again almost hysterically, and confessed with maiden shame, that Mr. Lawford was by far the dearest of her two lovers.

As she had anticipated, not many days elapsed before the tempestuous Colonel Wynn made his appearance at Lawford, the end of which was that two challenges were sent by him in one day; the one to her brother, the other to her new lover. The duels were fought, from which Mr. Rutherford and the colonel came off scathless, while Mr. Lawford received an injury in the left elbow, which after confining him for a few weeks left him with a stiff joint for the rest of his days. But this affair brought to him no other unpleasant consequences; on the contrary, he never apparently stood so high in the opinion of his country neighbors as when he first made his appearance again amongst them, with his arm in a sling, and as the affianced bridegroom of the beautiful Alice Rutherford.

CHAPTER II.

Years went on, and prosperity seemed to belong to the Lawfords. All went smoothly and brightly as on a summer's day, when, all at once, somebody put it into Mr. Lawford's head to offer himself as tory candidate for the county. Elections were long and fierce in those days, and the stories which old people tell of the bribery and corruption which took place, make those of the present time, the merest child's play. And of all the elections, that which Mr. Lawford carried has been always considered one of the most memorable. Little did Lawford think, when the idea first crossed his brain of offering himself, of the sum that it cost him; but such things have been before and since. The successful candidate finds, as the young Franklin did, that he has paid too dearly for his whistle.

"PERMIT ME TO BE YOUR ATTENDANT, AGREE," SAID MR. LAWFORD, TAKING HER HAND.

Peter Lawford took his seat in parliament, and that part of the world which knew him expected great things from him. Mrs. Lawford, like her husband, prided herself on her good sense and good management, and in order, as she said, that the expense of two establishments might be saved, a house was taken in London, the estate put into the hands of a trusty bailiff, the house shut up and left in charge of a couple of servants on board-wages; and Lawford determined now in his parliamentary career, to turn his law education to account, and win to himself he knew not how much honor and advantage. For ten long years did he occupy his place in parliament, never absenting himself from a single sitting, and distinguished himself by his hot and unflinching adherence to every principle of tory policy, either at home or abroad. His speeches were remarkable for two things, their soporific quality and their great length—some witty members having been known to put their night-caps on when he rose to his feet. But this moved not Mr. Lawford a jot, nor did he despond after ten years of unrewarded service. If the ministry had remained in office only six months longer, he believed that he should have risen to the peerage. But the whigs came into office, and, after an unsuccessful attempt to be returned in the new parliament, he came to Lawford and a country life, very much the worse for his ten years of public labor.

Mrs. Lawford was by no means a lady of an economical turn, although she had talked of leaving Lawford and removing to London to save the expense of two houses and two establishments. But the establishment in London cost far more than that in the country could have done; and then there was the winter at Bath or Cheltenham for the benefit of the lady's health, and the cottage in the Isle of Wight or at Worthing for the children and their attendants. All this dipped deeply into the annual rents of Lawford, which were yet not clear from the late Mr. Lawford's debts and consumed, as if they had fallen into a vortex, all the emoluments, and fees, and bribes, which dropped one way and another into the pockets of the parliamentary man of business.

Mr. Lawford came back to the home of his fathers a much poorer, and a much more anxious man than he had left it. Besides which, he had been compelled, in order to pay off the most pressing of his election debts, to sell the next presentation of the living of Lawford, which was then held by his uncle, at that time eighty years of age, and a free liver into the bargain. It was a ready means of raising money, and fifteen thousand pounds was thus obtained. He had three sons of his own, the second of whom was, as a matter of course, destined to the church, and for this living in particular; nor had he any doubt but by the time this young man was ready for his clerical duties, that fate or favorable circumstances would have cleared the way for him. But fate was hard; and favorable circumstance was none; for at the very time when the second son, Adolphus, the destined incumbent of Lawford, was in his twenty-first year, the old incumbent, or incumbent, rather, was in his ninety-fourth, a hale old man, who prided himself on reading without spectacles. It was a serious thing to the Lawfords, but a much more serious thing to the Rev. Mr. Colville, who, ten years before, had sunk all his worldly wealth, even more than he then possessed, to purchase this next presentation, which every one reckoned as good as his own on the day of purchase.

It is a proverb, that if you give an old woman an annuity, she will live for ever; so said the Rev. Mr. Colville a thousand times, only varying the proverb to suit his own case. The Lawfords were making a good figure in London, while the poor Colvilles, who had beggared themselves for the sake of their purchase, were struggling in a small curacy, with a large family and the most oppressive worldly anxieties. Old Humphrey Lawford would not die! It was in vain that Mr. and Mrs. Colville looked over the list of deaths in the daily papers; die he would not, and Mr. Colville had no influential connections to assist him. His very heart was sick of hope deferred; and so the bloom wore off his life and his hair grew gray, and his wife lost her cheerful looks and her placid temper, and it almost seemed to them that they would die themselves before this old incumbent who was now ninety-two.

One, two, three years went on, and the school that the poor curate had now kept for some years, ebbed and flowed with a very uncertain current, till, in the very half-year when Peter Lawford's parliamentary life came to a close without any golden sunset, a little scholar brought into the school the scarlet-fever, and one scholar, the son of his best supporter, died together with the youngest of his own children, the pet and darling of his cheerless heart. The cup of their misfortune and their misery seemed full. The last drop was in and it already flowed over.

The evening, however, on which the children were buried, a post letter brought the long expected news—old Humphrey Lawford was dead.

"Blessed be the Lord, inasmuch as his hand is yet stretched out to save us!" ejaculated the heart-stricken clergyman, as he laid down the letter, feeling, nevertheless, in the sorrowful depths of his heart, as if the time of rejoicing was gone forever from him.

"Oh that poor Jeanie had but lived!" groaned the mother, as she read the letter which her husband had laid down. Her eye caught her husband's; heart understood heart, and clasping each other in a long embrace, they wept together.

CHAPTER III.

THE very day on which the Colvilles, in a deep mourning, and with their grief-subdued countenances, took possession of their long-expected home, the Lawford family came back to the old hall. It was a sore thought to Mr. Lawford and his wife, that there was a man hardly arrived at middle life, at that very moment come into the possession of that heritage which, from his childhood upward, they had regarded as the patrimony of their second son; and what if he lived to the age of old Humphrey? and he might do so, sailing thus, like a ship after a stormy voyage, into a haven of blessed repose. What prospect was there then for poor Adolphus? "Poor Adolphus!" sighed they whenever they thought of the rectory: "Poor Adolphus!" whenever they thought on the young man himself; for even they, with all the partiality of parents were forced to confess, that Adolphus was the least gifted of all their offspring, and who, on the fat living of Lawford, might have kept a curate, and with the patronage and forbearance of his own family, might have gone respectably through life, but who otherwise could not look even to be another man's curate. Another vexatious thing there was, and it was a very vexatious thing; old Humphrey Lawford, who had been a bachelor all his days, and never had spent the half of his income, and who had indulged in but one luxury, that of buying books, had left behind him a most unsatisfactory will. He had left his library to his own college; his money in the funds to four public societies; and all his furniture, and all his personal property to his forty years' housekeeper. Not one penny came to his nephew or his family! Mr. Lawford literally begrudged the cost of family mourning.

The Lawford family were four. George, the eldest, a young man, whose gay college life had caused his father great displeasure, and was now placed rather on the shady side of his affections. The second was the only daughter Camilla, somewhat turned of twenty, a very well-bred and highly accomplished young lady, as every one said, and her father's favorite. Camilla was much more remarkable for her wit and her talents than for her beauty, being the plainest of the family—the only one, indeed, who had not inherited the fine Rutherford eyes and cast of countenance. Her complexion was dark; her eyes gray, with a keen intelligence in them, perfectly in accordance with her well-cut and firmly-closing mouth.

"It is a pity that Camilla is not a boy!" said her mother, when she saw how, by an absolute love of rule, and a natural force of character, she, as a little girl, had governed her brothers and those about her. As Camilla grew up, very little was said of her amiability. She was too cold, too selfish, too fond of power, ever to be much loved; but love was not the thing that she very much cared about. If she had power, that would give her an influence and a consideration which suited her much better. One characteristic, however, there was in her, which was praiseworthy; and that was the kindness and attention she always bestowed upon her smally gifted brother Adolphus. Adolphus seemed ever more dependent upon her than upon his parents; he looked up to her as to a superior being, and she took his part, with all her natural strength of will, in all his follies and his weaknesses. Of course, Camilla could not be expected to look upon the newly-arrived family at the rectory with any forbearance; she was more vehement against them than her parents, and declared that she would never sit under the preaching of a man whom she and all her family had such good reason to dislike.

Five years younger than Adolphus was Frank, the last of the family, and the most highly gifted. As a little child, he had been the privileged disturber of his father's study, even in the most occupied days of his parliamentary life. He was his mother's darling, and was taken out with her shopping and making-morning calls, when the prudent matrons of her acquaintance thought that he would have been much better occupied over his lessons. But Frank learned, Heaven knows how, although the good clergyman, with whom he was said to be a weekly boarder, complained quite as much of non-attendance as he would have done of non-payment.

"Frank has a splendid head, if there be any truth in phrenology," said his father, many a time, putting aside the bright curls from his beautiful forehead; "and it will be his own fault if he do not make a figure in the world."

"Frank has the noblest of hearts," said his mother, with a tearful eye, to her friends; "he is the flower of our flock, and will outshine his elder brothers in intellect; but that is of less consequence, because they may be reckoned as provided for, and therefore it is but just that my boy has Benjamin-portion of natural gifts."

Mr. Lawford remembering with pleasure his own life as a law-student, and cherishing the idea that he himself was a Lord-Chancellor lost, destined Frank for the bar.

"He will make a figure there," said his mother, "for he has natural eloquence, quite a style of his own, and the keenest insight into everything. He was born for a lawyer."

People said, and wise people too, that the foolish admiration of his parents would be the ruin of young Lawford. But there are some natures that take a deal of spoiling, and Frank was one of them. He was not spoiled at seventeen, even though he knew well enough that he was considered much cleverer than his elder brothers, and that it was the general opinion, too, that he had a much finer disposition, and was handsome as a youth, and promised to be very handsome as a man. Spoiled he was not; but then neither was he improved by it. Vanity, that ill-weed and that offspring of weakness, was fostered in his nature, and thus more mortification, and a severer self-discipline, were stored up for him in after life.

Had his sister Camilla been of a nature less dominant, she perhaps might best have managed a disposition like her young brother's. Camilla, with her keen insight into character, was early aware of the fine talents and nature of the boy; and, as was natural, took upon herself to school and train him, never concealing, however, that it was rather to gratify her own love of power than anything else. Hence, between these two, there existed a continual species of warfare, a strife for mastery, which was conducive neither to their own nor the family happiness. Their mother, desirous above all things for peace, coaxed the one and scolded the other, and always without success.

"Now, Frank, my angel," his mother would say, stroking the beautiful cheeks of the handsome youth, "what is the sense of opposing your sister in this way? Sing this duet with her; it is but a small thing, and if you love me you will do it!"

"If it were for love of you, I would do it, and ten times more," Frank would reply, "and, as you say, it is not much, but then Camilla has said that I shall do it. Shall is a law with Camilla, and if I submit once I must submit a hundred times,—it is not 'as you will,' but 'as I will,' with Camilla!"

And "How can you be so tyrannical with poor Frank," her mother would say to her, in an angry tone, "as to have him up, morning, noon, and night, at that everlasting duet? You have not a spark of reason or consideration in you. Let my will be done, is your motto, without any regard to another's feelings!"

"Frank is a spoiled child," Camilla would reply, resolutely: "and will do nothing that does not offer incense to his vanity. The discipline I would now subject him to, would spare him trouble in after life; it would be his greatest happiness to submit to me. He would have to thank me for it. He has great talents, but they will all run to waste from want of steady purposes. To what does he apply himself steadily—to nothing! And I know that I am right in requiring him to sing this duet with me, even if it were ten times more disagreeable!"

Mrs. Lawford had always the worst of an argument with her daughter, and from such controversy as this she mostly retired, to persuade Frank to compliance, or to be witness to an unhappy strife between her two strong-willed children.

It was in the maturity of spring, towards the latter end of the merry month of May, that the Lawfords returned, and the rector's family took possession of their new home. Happily for Frank, his own family, and Camilla in particular, were so much occupied in attending to their own concerns, as not to have much time to think about him. He therefore was for a time left to his own free-will to range about the wide manor of Lawford; to find the primroses growing fresh on the mossy banks of woody dingles, and the yellow cowslips and purple violets in the grassy fields; and take his rod and line, and first essay the gentle craft of angling in the little babbling streams, which, whilst they had all the charm of being full of the early and else forgotten memories of childhood, had at the same time all the fascination and charm of novelty. What a blessed thing it seemed to him, to throw himself down here under the branches of a tree, covered with the young tender leaves of the season, and reading some glorious books of poetry or poetical literature, feel himself as it were a free man, caring nothing for the domination of Camilla. The soul of a poet in those joyous days first awoke within him; and, without being able, had he tried to define or describe his feelings, he found that a well-spring of happiness and tender and lofty emotion lay within him; which the rejoicing, carol of the skylark, or the gushing sunlight through the delicate leaves, could call forth. At such times, his whole soul was a fountain of deep love; and even the stern proud Camilla appeared before him softened and glorified.

Weeks went on; and during this time, Frank had advanced in knowledge of many things. Between his family and the rectory, as we said before, there existed a coldness, an unfriendly feeling; rather, however, it must be confessed, on the side of Mr. Lawford than the clergyman's. Camilla, who, among her other characteristics, was very polemically inclined, soon discovered that Mr. Colville was not an evangelical preacher, and therefore gave herself the trouble of going five miles every Sunday, to attend the ministry of a neighboring clergyman, with whom and his family she formed a close intimacy. This new acquaintance, to the comfort of poor Frank, occupied her mind, and removed her from home a good deal; so that he was left, in his turn, to make acquaintance, which he very soon found to be as much to his taste as his sister's was to hers.

Within the park of Lawford, or rather at its edge, stood the church, about a quarter of a mile from the Hall. The church was remarkably picturesque, with its tall gray tower of good proportions, and fine style of architecture, and surrounded by its little quiet field of graves. Frank found much to interest and please him in this sacred little spot; and yet, when there, was never so much occupied by his poetic musings, as not to have an eye to spare for the rectory grounds, which bounded one side of it, and which, from one particular part of the churchyard, lay open to view. The first time Frank was here, he saw the rector's daughter, a fair, slight girl, walking in the garden, surrounded by a tribe of young brothers and sisters. His first thought was, what a large family the rector had; his second how interesting was that fair sister, who, all unconscious of a stranger's observations, seemed like the spirit of affection and tenderness. Day after day, Frank visited that particular corner of the churchyard, sometimes seeing different members of the family, sometimes not. He was remarkably regular in his attendance at church, though his family was not so; nor did he allow himself to be the least in the world prejudiced against their new neighbors, even though "poor Adolphus," through them, would stand in want of a home.

The rector's young people, however, like Frank, soon discovered that there were very charming dingles, where primroses grew, in various parts of the park and hills in the neighborhood, where fine views might be obtained over the country; and it was not very long before some or other of them met with him, or he with them. From these meetings an intimacy grew up. Frank undertook to be their guide here and there; and they, in their turn, made him soon feel that without him, a rural excursion could afford them very little pleasure.

The rector and his lady, who, after so many years of waiting, anxiety, and sorrow, had now anchored, as it were, in this sunny bay of life, could afford to be in good humor with all the world. Right excellent people were they, said every one, rich and poor alike; and, though it was some little cause of regret to them, that the squire and his lady were among the most negligent of his parishioners in their attendance at church, and their daughter had, in the most pointed manner, withdrawn herself from under his pastoral care, yet that was no reason why the rector in his office of pastor of his flock, should send out, as it were, the sheep-dog of his anger, barking after his lukewarm or even stray sheep. No, his plan was to keep his eye on them in kindness and good-will, and not to obtrude himself on their notice, other than by good offices. A desire, therefore, to influence the parents through the son, perhaps made him receive Frank with the greatest kindness and endeavor that all his visits to the rectory should be as agreeable as possible. To his mother, Frank spoke of his intimacy at the rectory, and of his pleasant visits there, but to no one else; and his mother well pleased that he should meet with agreeable associates, was entirely satisfied, and began even to meditate upon placing her son under the rector's care, instead of sending him at present to any public school.

In this way Frank knew the Colville family, old and young, and used to amuse and interest his mother by his anecdotes of the interior of the rectory. He was a great favorite with the rector's lady, because he amused the little children. He cut mice out of apple pippins, and swans out of apples themselves; made skipping-rats with his rolled-up pocket-handkerchief, and rabbits on the wall with his hands. He was a most amusing companion to them, and nothing delighted them more than to see him between the garden-trees by the fish-pond. The one, however, who evinced most pleasure in his society, though that not with the vociferation of the younger children, was that fair, slender girl who had first made the rectory-lawn so interesting to him. With Emma he sat for hours, reading to her as she sat at work, or in quiet and very lover-like conversation. Frank was seventeen, a tall stripling, Emma was a year his senior; on his part, at least, it was a very tender and a very warm flame. From Emma he soon heard, as well as from the younger children and their parents, of John, the eldest of the family. John was turned three-and-twenty, and was at college—at the very college where his own brothers were. It seemed to him a remarkable coincidence. The whole family, old and young, were enthusiastic in his praise. "Brother John," said the children, "gave them this book; taught them that accomplishment; devised for them that pleasure; oh, there was no one in this world like brother John!" Emma joined in the same panegyric to his praise. John had been the associate of all her pleasures, the consoler in all her troubles. He was so clever, so gay! They should have such delightful times when John came home!

To hear Emma and the younger ones talk of this wonderful brother, Frank fancied a light-hearted, merry youth, full of fun and frolic, beside whom he should be a very monk for sedateness. To hear the parents, however, speak of him, a very different idea was suggested. John had been his father's pupil, grave, and steady, and precocious. Latin and Greek had been to him mere child's play. He had been usher in his father's school when only fifteen. He had lived with his parents, not as their child, but as their friend and adviser. But, great as had been John's virtues at home, his college-life had even exhibited his character to greater advantage. He had struggled through poverty and hardship; had been untempted by pleasure; and now, by great ability and most unheard-of industry, had carried all honors before him; had won the regard of the heads of the college, and the esteem of his fellow collegians. He had now taken his degree, and had won also for himself a fast friend and sure patron in the son of Earl —, a young man of great promise and virtue. Frank thought of his own brothers, whose college-lives had caused his parents such uneasiness and trouble—of the gay, thoughtless George, whose debts had for the present turned his father's heart from him, and of poor Adolphus, who had not sense enough to keep out of scrapes. The next college vacation John Colville would be at home—at that new home, the prosperity of which was the more welcome on his account.

Frank thought of John Colville night and day, and set him up as a sort of ideal model to himself. He, too, he resolved, would distinguish himself; he, too, would endeavor to be the pride and blessing of his family.

At length the time came which was to bring the young collegians home—the young spend-thrifts to the Hall, and the hard-working and honor-crowned John to the rectory. Very little was said at the Hall about the expected arrivals there; the father was out of humor; the mother uneasy; and Camilla, who, when her elder brothers were concerned, admitted a rival idea with her new evangelical notions, alert and determined, yet silent.

Frank went to the rectory the evening before the day on which John was expected. He felt more impatient to see him than his brothers.

John Colville was to him the name of a dear friend; he felt already to love him; he thought how he would freely open his heart to him, and ask counsel from him of many things which as yet lay in dim perspective before him. His idea of John Colville was that of intellectual force and spiritual beauty. He thought of Milton, and Philip Melancthon, and Fenelon, and Luther, and those fine spirits who were the idols of his heart's worship, whenever he thought of him.

He went, not expecting to find him arrived, but merely because his heart impelled him to tell his friends that he would think of them on the morrow. Scarcely, however, was he within the garden-gate, when Emma Colville came bounding towards him, exclaiming that John was come; and then out came rushing the younger children to tell him the same thing; and when he said how glad he was, how delighted they must be, all their faces grew serious, and they said, "Oh, but John was going away on the morrow, was going out of England, for they knew not how long!"

By this time, Frank, with a beating heart and a crimsoning brow and cheek, had entered the dining-room by the open French window to which Mr. Colville had beckoned him, and the next moment he stood before John Colville. And this then was he! A short, stiff, solidly-built young man, with a compactly put-together head, thickly covered with short, crisped black hair; a forehead of great strength rather than beauty, which rose above a pair of deep-set, small, dark eyes, of a grave, intelligent, yet rather cold expression; a remarkably well-formed nose and mouth that looked as if chiseled out of granite. There was an iron-gray tinge about the lower part of the face which indicated a strong, black beard, but all this, even to the whiskers, was closely shaved, revealing the clear, strong curve of the jaw, which added an expression of force to this remarkable, but not altogether pleasing countenance. The dress exactly suited the character of the face, there was no foppish or nonsense of any kind, about it. All was plain and in excellent keeping. He was evidently, as Frank saw at a glance, one of the rara aves—an old head on young shoulders; such a son could be no other than his father's friend and confidant; but he felt that years would never make him as intimate with the son as months only had with the father. Mr. Colville and his son were in deep conversation together, as the mother, taking Frank by the hand, led him up to them. "This is our young friend, Frank Lawford, John," said she. "Ah, Frank, my boy," said the rector, "we've got John among us at last, you see!"

John gave his hand, spoke a few civil words, eyed Frank for a moment with his searching glance from head to foot; and then, as if he had quite satisfied himself, turned again to his father and pursued the conversation which had been interrupted. Poor Frank's enthusiasm felt as if blown upon by an icy wind; he withdrew a few paces. Mrs. Colville was listening to her son and so were the girls; even Emma did not seem to have a thought to spare for him; he felt that he was not wanted, and, making his adieus, very unobtrusively withdrew. He felt that he had no right to be disappointed in John Colville; he was exactly the sort of person he might have expected, a strong-minded, clear-headed, independent sort of man. Frank, however, fancied that he looked cold-blooded and calculating, and wanting in that generous enthusiasm which was his own characteristic. He recalled to his memory all that had been told of his high virtue, his self-denial, his industry, his devotion to his family, his honorable life at college, the distinction and the friendship he had won. Yes, all this was very noble, Frank could not but acknowledge; and yet some way he felt that after all his golden idol was but a mixture of clay.

In a day or two, his brother Adolphus returned: George preferred absenting himself; and with Adolphus came much news and talk of John Colville. According to him, John Colville was the most time-serving sycophant in all Oxford; he had been the merest lickspittle to the Earl of —'s son, with whom he was about to set out as traveling companion. Adolphus might himself have won honors had it not been for this young man, this son of the very person who was keeping him out of his heritage! Camilla took the part of her brother; her inveteracy against the rector's family was hotter than ever; and then it came out that she had not been in ignorance, but had only connived at Frank's intimacy there. Camilla had her way. Frank's little friendship on his own account was thwarted; but, as was natural, his little love affair grew only the more interesting. Emma and he exchanged looks of hair; he wrote to her the most touching little poems; and after Christmas he was sent to a great public school, preparatory to his college life.

Twelve months after this time, when Frank came home for his vacation, he found very extraordinary things going forward. But these require a word of explanation. After Frank left, as was only natural, the coldness continued between the families at the Hall and the rectory. In a while news came that the earl's son, with whom John Colville had been traveling, and whose health had for many years been delicate, had died in Italy, leaving to his friend and his companion a legacy of five thousand pounds; and that the earl, his father, had given him the next presentation to a good living, which was expected to fall vacant almost daily. "That young man is bound to be fortunate," said all the world.

His return to his family made quite a sensation through the neighborhood, and even among Camilla's evangelical friends. Camilla herself, it must be presumed, became interested by all she heard; but, for the sake of consistency, she was very bitter in her remarks upon him. Camilla was a clever diplomatist; and John Colville had not been long at the rectory with his grave, self-possessed manner, his independent bearing, and his deep mourning, before she found herself animated by the most lively zeal to have all the poor children in the parish educated. This could not be done without the sanction and assistance of the clergyman; and to him she went, begging his advice and co-operation. Nothing could have pleased the rector more: he and Camilla worked hard at the school; and from this day no one was more intimate at the rectory than herself. She became quite eloquent against herself, and the mischief which prejudice of any kind does in society; it was her bounden duty to acknowledge it; and nothing that she could do was too much for her new, dear friends. She talked to them of "poor Adolphus," and they admired her sisterly affection, her spirit, her candor, her good sense, her decision of character. They saw nothing but virtues in her; and more than this, it was not long before John Colville was seen coming and going between the rectory and the Hall, before he and Camilla were seen walking together arm in arm in deep confidential discourse. The world jumped to no false conclusion when it said, that the rector's son and the squire's daughter would one day be married.

This was the news that met Frank on his return home. Why was he somehow vexed about it? He could not satisfactorily answer that question to himself. At the rectory he was received with the greatest kindness; but somehow he felt in the depths of his soul a melancholy presentiment that when Camilla was the caressed and flattered, and favored daughter-in-law elect, the chosen of the idol John, he could never occupy the place he had done. Even Emma seemed changed, and charged him before the assembled family with undervaluing Camilla. The whole family were clamorous in lauding Camilla's generosity, warm-heartedness, and unselfishness, those very qualities which he had thought her deficient in, and were ready to quarrel with him because of them. Emma was to be Camilla's bridesmaid, and they, too, were inseparable,—besides which, she seemed to have imbibed a cordial interest for "poor Adolphus," and whether it was wounded vanity or becoming self-respect, Frank quietly withdrew himself, recalling to his mind the repulsive sentiment he at first had felt in the pattern John Colville, and thinking that he must be contented to give up his friends and to endure the blighting of his first love; and that was all.

To no soul but to his mother did he open his heart, and that only so far as regarded his future brother-in-law.

"John Colville is a clever man of the world," said she. "Camilla and he are admirably suited for each other. If John should ever be a bishop—and he is likely enough—Camilla will put the mitre on his brows; and, thank God, between them they will take care of 'poor Adolphus!'"

The day of Camilla's marriage arrived. The children of the newly-established schools scattered flowers in her path; and the bride and bridegroom returned to the Hall to partake a wedding-breakfast with the united families. Nothing could be gayer than all around them; bells ringing, sun shining, and the various members of the two families exchanging congratulations. At the "head of the table" sat Mrs. Lawford, smiling and gay; she had excited and exerted herself much on this occasion. All at once she was seen to make an attempt to rise, and then she sank back into her chair, and, laying her hand on her side, exclaimed, "Oh, God! my heart, my heart!"

A flush for one moment covered her countenance, and then a change passed over it, and a palor as of death. She was a large, heavy woman, and was with difficulty removed to the sofa. A physician was instantly fetched; he attempted to bleed her; but human aid was vain. She died of an affection of the heart, under which she had long labored, in the fifty-seventh year of her age. No conception can be formed of the effects of this shock in the midst of bridal festivity and joy.

"Oh, my mother!" exclaimed Frank, falling on his knees before her, and clasping her hand, with a convulsive burst of sorrow, to his lips,—"no one loved you as I did; no one will mourn for you as I shall!"

Frank said right—no one mourned her so deeply as he did. Years did not remove the effect from his spirit; nay, his whole life bore traces of it; and those traces, like the seed sown in good ground, produced a harvest for the garner of heaven.

At the moment of Mrs. Lawford's death, the bride and bridegroom were about to set out on a marriage tour of some months, at the end of which time they hoped the living destined for them would be ready. Camilla, however, promptly, find at that moment properly, decided that the tour should be given up, for that she could not leave her family in this sudden distress. At first her father, thankful for the assistance of his strong-minded daughter, resigned everything to her management; but when, as his mind recovered its usual tone, he saw how completely Mr. and Mrs. John Colville were the masters there, he roused himself, and quietly intimated that this was not their permanent home. Camilla's permanent home was not, however, ready for her; and making yet an effort to retain her power, her father wrote to his son George, who now had been living so long under his displeasure, inviting him to return and assist him henceforth in the management of his affairs. George, who by this time had sown all his wild oats, accepted his father's invitation with unbounded joy, and within a few days presented himself at Lawford, to the surprise of his sister, who knew nothing of what her father had done. The father and son met with the utmost affection and confidence; and from this Camilla understood her father's real intentions. Not a hint, however, did she give of this; but speaking only of the pleasure she and her husband would now have in being released to attend to their own duties, made her retreat with all the dignity of entire conquest.

CHAPTER IV.

YEARS went on. George married much to his father's wishes, and grandchildren sat on the old man's knees. As was expected, Camilla and her husband, now Dr. Colville, provided for Adolphus; and this made her family regard her with unbounded gratitude. "She is a wonderful woman," said her brother George. "She has the credit of the family so at heart," said her father—"has never let the world know of poor Adolphus' deficiencies; and even when he married a farmer's daughter, took the young woman under her care, and made a complete gentlewoman of her!" "A really noble character is Aunt Colville," said young Mrs. Lawford to her children; thinking that, as Aunt Colville had none of her own, her sons and daughters could not do better than be such to her. "Never fail in deference to your aunt, and only try to be as clever a woman as she is?"

Dr. Colville was now an archdeacon. All the world bore testimony to his talents and his ambition. Churchmen said that he was fit to be an archbishop; that his controversial writings placed him at the head of all polemical writers whatever; that he was one of the staunchest pillars of the church and state; that he was proud and ambitious to be sure, but then he had the zeal of an apostle. Dissenters and radicals, and such like people, said that Dr. Colville was the most bigoted zealot of the present day; a proud, hot-headed churchman; an upholder of every corruption of church and state; a man no more fitted to preach and teach the doctrines and practices of the humble, self-denying son of the poor carpenter, than Judas Iscariot himself, who sold him for money, as Dr. Colville and such men did!

Frank ever since his law studies had begun, had lived in London, apart from his family. They pursued their course, and he his, every passing year making the distance between them in many respects greater and greater. He was called to the bar, and his family began to listen, somewhat impatiently, for the reports of his law-reputation. "What is Frank doing?" asked old Mr. Lawford of his eldest son; and his eldest son answered him by merely repeating the question, and somehow or other, they obtained from somewhere a very unsatisfactory answer. Frank had left the bar and turned—what had he turned? A shopkeeper? No! A Methodist preacher? No; worse even than that—he had turned an author! An author! repeated some individual of the family; well, well, after all that might not be so very bad. He had perhaps been writing on the practice or usage of law; whole libraries of books have been written about law, and all books must have authors.

No, no! Frank had not written on law; Frank had written a poem—and a novel! these anonymously. No wonder he got no briefs; and now he had come out in his own name, as the author of some strange book which nobody could rightly understand, and yet which everybody was reading.

The good people at Lawford regarded an author as some sort of a disreputable character; a combination of extravagance and poverty. Authors were people who never had a shilling to bless themselves with; who sat shivering in garrets, with blankets pinned round them, writing for their daily bread, which they were never able to win. Old Mr. Lawford, in his reading days, had read Johnson's "Lives of the Poets." The life of Savage was the only one he distinctly remembered; but that, and the print of Hogarth's poor author, which, with the rest of the set, hung in the dining-room at the hall, furnished him with his idea of authors. Duns and printers' devils besieged their doors; they were people who always were in debt for their lodgings and their green-groceries. Professional men, and county families, could not associate with authors, penny-a-liners, and poor devils! George, who never had been a reader, adopted his father's notions, and thought, of a truth, that Frank was disgracing the family. The only periodicals that came to Lawford were the Gentleman's Magazine and the Quarterly Review; the Gentleman's never condescended to speak of Frank's publications; but the Quarterly contained a regular slashing and cutting-up article on his last work. It was full of bitter personal sarcasm; taunted, and jeered, and ridiculed, and then, instead of proof from the volume, gave mutilated passages, in italics and Roman capitals, so that the very author might blush at his words. The Lawfords felt as if the whole family was cut up, root and branch, by this article.

"I shall never show my face again in public!" said old Mr. Lawford.

"Frank has disgraced us all!" exclaimed George, in a towering passion.

By the next post letters from Lawford reached the author, expressing the family displeasure at this his unimaginable folly. In return Frank sent them reviews on the other side; but these they never read. He knew whom he had to thank for the invective in the Quarterly—it was Archbishop Colville; but he made no remonstrance to him, for he had long known that he and his brother-in-law could not be expected to think alike. Camilla wrote to him a dictatorial and yet a half-flattering letter, acknowledging his talents and upbraiding him for the abuse of them. His reply to her was in the words of Scripture: "Let not him who hath put his hand to the plough turn back to the house to fetch his clothes." Camilla said it was a misapplication of Scripture; it was an abuse of holy things; it was almost blasphemy; and while her brother remained in that temper, he must take his own course and the consequences of it.

Frank was not much surprised by the letters from his family: he knew that this, his new course of life, involved their displeasure, perhaps entire alienation from him. This, however painful, he must bear. Frank saw many things very differently from what they did. At the same time that he did not, by any means, undervalue wealth, or rank, or worldly distinction, there were other things which he valued more highly—truth, justice, and the peace of his own mind; and these seemed to have called him into the ranks of literature, despised though this vocation might be by his family. Nevertheless, like every young author, he doubted not but that his course would be a brilliant one; and that he should achieve fortune at the same time that he achieved fame and honor. Ah, poor Lawford! he was young in those days; and, though his glowing, youthful enthusiasm prophesied truly of the glory and usefulness of the future, it told him nothing of sleepless nights, and weary days of labor and disappointment, and weariness of brain, and anxiety that would not be allayed. Of these it told him nothing: his sister Camilla was the raven that croaked of all these things; and his father, to whom she sent copies of all her letters, repeated the doleful note. But Frank Lawford was incorrigible; and, after some time, the family made up their minds to bear, as philosophically as they could, the disgrace of being connected with a poor, thriftless author; giving him, as their parting words, the intelligence, that having willfully turned his back on the path of honorable independence, if not of distinction, which they had chosen for him, he must never look to them for countenance or assistance.

Time went on; and then it came suddenly into the heads of sundry people, that George Lawford, Esquire, of Lawford, would most ably represent their interests in parliament; and accordingly he was warmly solicited to allow himself to be nominated. His father thought of his own parliamentary life, now lying behind him at the distance of many years, and to him it seemed encircled with a golden halo. Yes, his son, his favorite son, as he now called him, must certainly serve his country, as his father had done before him. George was not unwilling; Dr. and Mrs. Colville warmly seconded it; but then came a difficulty—George was no public speaker; the election would be contested violently; there was a deal of popular talent on the other side; pamphlets and broadsides were already in circulation; George must have some one beside him who could write and even speak for him. "If I had only Frank's powers!" said George. Mrs. Colville had thought the same thing, and so had her husband; and then, as by a simultaneous impulse of mind, the whole family conclave spoke out. Would it not be as well to make use of Frank? there had been displeasure enough shown by them. To be sure, Frank might have served them just as well, had he been a barrister; but then, as he chose to be an author, why not make use of him? Poor Frank! no doubt he would embrace, with joy, such an opportunity of reconciliation with his family; and then, when his brother was in parliament, he might be able to do something for him; and, as this unfortunate cacoethes scribendi seemed natural to him, they must have a little charity towards him, just as they would if he had a crooked spine. "To be sure we must," said Mrs. Colville, who had come to the Hall for the occasion, "we must all remember that Frank is our own flesh and blood!"

His father wrote to him immediately a letter at Camilla's dictation. A good deal was said of his delinquency; of his having run counter to the wishes of his father, of the grief which his pertinacity had occasioned, and of the willingness there was, notwithstanding, in the parental heart, to pity and to forgive. Now, he was told, an opportunity offered to serve his brother George in his own peculiar way; and by serving George, to oblige his family. His family were willing, the letter said, to make this occasion the means of family union; the past should be forgotten, and good understanding henceforward exist among them. The whole affair was then explained to him; and he was desired immediately to come down, so that, on the spot, he might employ all his powers for the service of his brother.

Instead of going down, however, as requested, Frank replied by letter to the family proposal of peace; and this letter fell like a thunderbolt among them. It was a long and eloquent letter; a letter full of affection, and which had not been written without emotion. The purport of it was, that much as Frank desired a reunion with his family, willing as he would be, at any personal risk to himself, to serve any one of them; yet, he grieved to say, that in this one particular alone he could do nothing. The most honest and single-minded inquiry after truth, had led him to adopt political opinions opposite to those of his family. It was a matter of principle and duty with him, not of pleasure or will; and that, however painful it was to differ or separate himself in any way from those with whom natural affection allied him, he had no alternative, if they regarded his conduct as offensive; because every principle of religion and duty would force him to adhere to what he considered as truth.

No words can describe the wrath and indignation and scorn which this letter produced. He was a traitor to God and to his family. This was what his abandonment of a gentlemanly profession had led him to! They knew that it would lead to no good; Dr. Colville had said, from the first, that there was nothing but rank radicalism in his books, however disguised; he was a disgrace to the family! and it was a thousand pities that ever they had asked his assistance.

The most angry letters were sent him in reply. His father disowned him as his son; Mrs. Colville as her brother; George foretold the loss of his own election through him; and even poor Adolphus put forth a feeble philippic.

As George had foretold, he lost his election; and lost with it a deal of money, which made it harder still to bear: all of which, as a matter of course, was ascribed to Frank.

CHAPTER V.

FRANK LAWFORD had yet a third sin to commit, and that was his marriage; but a peculiar event led to that, which we must relate. He was walking one day along Harley street, when a horse in a private little carriage, in which an elderly lady was seated, took flight, and almost immediately dashed it to pieces against some impediment in the road. The lady was in the utmost alarm and danger; when Frank, without a moment's consideration for himself, rushed forward, and bore her in his arms to a place of safety. Every one admired his promptitude and presence of mind. The old lady was most grateful; and, giving her address, begged him to call upon her. This led to an intimate acquaintance. She unfolded to him her particular circumstances; told him that she had no immediate connections in the world, excepting an old Scots cousin, with whom, as a child, she had been brought up. To him she had left the bulk of her property, and to his children, one of whom was a missionary in the East Indies; another, a clergyman in Scotland; and the third, a daughter, who gained her living as a daily governess. The father and daughter lived in London; but a misunderstanding of some years' existence kept them apart. The old gentleman was, in case she died without a will, her heir-at-law; but it was her intention, she said to surprise him by her liberality. She knew him very well, and his proud spirit; he would not come near her, lest he should seem to be courting her favor; but she would be his and his children's benefactor after all. But there was more to leave, the old lady went on to say, than what she meant for the Macintyres: she should have a residuary legatee, and perhaps—and with this she nodded and said, that Mr. Frank would never have reason to regret having risked himself to save her. There was something very cordial and maternal about this old Mrs. Vaughan; and, in reply to all her inquiries respecting his family and his prospects, he frankly told all—that he was disowned by his family, and why. Mrs. Vaughan was herself a radical in politics—Heaven help her! She went a long way beyond Frank; advocated universal suffrage, and universal equality in every way, for rich and poor, black and white, man and woman, alike. All that was good and right as a principle; but then, Mrs. Vaughan was very extreme in her opinions for all that: thought that women should choose their own husbands very much more independently than they now did; and that they should sit in parliament as well as men. It was on these subjects, she said, that she and her cousin Macintyre had quarreled. Frank was the least in the world startled when he saw, in this lady, the exaggerated reflex of his own opinion; but he nevertheless made her a present of a handsomely bound set of his own works, which she very carefully read and criticized very freely. At Mrs. Vaughan's, Frank met a certain Mr. Morgan, an author likewise by profession, a round-faced, sallow-complexioned young man, of very obsequious and deferential manners; but whose political and general opinions much more accorded with the old lady's than his own. Frank felt a sort of instinctive dislike to Morgan; Morgan's ultra notions seemed to create a reaction in his mind; and long, and often very warm, were the arguments between them in Mrs. Vaughan's presence, where alone he met Morgan, and to please and flatter whom Frank suspected these opinions to be held.

Like old Mr. Macintyre, Frank felt frequently a sort of delicacy in going uninvited to Mrs. Vaughan's, lest it should seem to be for selfish ends; besides which, the society of Morgan, whom he was always sure to meet there, was extremely distasteful to him.

One day when Frank had been absent a whole month, received a note from the house-keeper, informing him that Mrs. Vaughan was very ill and wished to see him. He found her evidently sinking fast; she was still sensible, pressed his hand, reproached him for his long absence, and spoke with tears of her gratitude. Morgan was not there; and with a feeling of self-reproach for having really neglected her—she, who had been as a mother to him when his own father and family had cast him off—he resolved, during the rest of her life, to devote himself to her. He stayed with her the whole day; read prayers to her, to which she was too weak to respond; and only left her at night on the assurance of the physician that he saw no immediate danger, promising to return early the next morning. The next morning when he returned she was no more.

Her death affected him greatly, much more than he could have imagined. He was invited by her executors to attend her funeral and be present at the reading of her will. There were present, beside himself, the executors, Mr. Morgan, and Mr. Macintyre and his daughter. Mr. Macintyre was an old man; he probably, however, looked older than he really was, from his snow-white hair and a degree of paralytic weakness, which had given a bending feebleness to his whole person. He entered the room, leaning on the arm of his daughter, a young lady of perhaps three and twenty, whose countenance was less remarkable for beauty than a pensive, earnest expression, which told that sorrow had made early demands upon a mind naturally reflective.

Miss Macintyre moved slightly but courteously to the assembled company, and then occupied herself by seating her father in the large cushioned chair which had been provided for him. After he was seated, the old gentleman looked round with the air of one who felt himself the principal person there. He had already acted as chief mourner; and having now arranged his whole person to his mind, he remarked that nothing, he believed, prevented their proceeding to business.

There seemed some little hesitation and uncertainty among the executors, every one of whom saw a some one else there in that character whom they did not expect. At length, however, at a nod from Mr. Morgan, which Mr. Macintyre internally called impertinent, the seals were broken and the reading of the will commenced. Frank glanced round the assembly; every countenance appeared calm excepting Morgan's, which was deeply flushed, and the quick, restless movement of whose eye betokened something extraordinary. He divined how it was. The will bore date but a few months previously. Three thousand pounds was left to Mr. Macintyre; considerable sums to various charities; her large edition of the works of Thomas Paine, and her Boyle's Dictionary, bound in calf, to Frank Lawford, Esquire, and the whole remainder of her property, real and personal, to Joseph Morgan, Esquire, subject only to the payment of a few stipulated annuities.

The will was listened to with apparent patience in the hope of some codicil or other. But no; codicil there was none. Joseph Morgan was residuary legatee, and Frank Lawford had a few books.

"This is not the will!" exclaimed Mr. Macintyre.

"This was not the will of five years ago, in which I was an executor!" exclaimed one or two, whose names as executors were now omitted.

"This is her last will and testament!" said Mr. Morgan, with an ill-suppressed exultation.

Frank Lawford felt now, for the first time, that really, after all, the old lady's will had been a matter of importance to him. He was excited and displeased; he felt that he had been deceived, if not ill-used.

"Let us go!" said Catherine Macintyre to her father, on whom she feared the effects of this unlooked-for testamentary document.

"Three thousand pounds only!" said he, without noticing his daughter; "and what do you suppose the residuary legatee's share may be—this Morgan, whom nobody knows anything about—what will he get?" asked the old gentleman from one of the executors under the former will, and who, not being named in the new one, had thus lost the two hundred pounds which were left to each executor for his trouble, and thus felt himself also an aggrieved party.

"Not much under twenty thousand pounds," replied he, "when all the annuities are reckoned out."

Poor Macintyre swore that he would have the will set aside; called Morgan a knave and an artful interloper, and a scene of angry contention began.

"Let us go, dearest father," again besought Catherine, casting at the same moment a glance towards Frank Lawford, as if asking for his assistance.

"Who are you?" asked Mr. Macintyre, almost fiercely, as Frank came forward and politely offered to assist the old gentleman out.

"This is Mr. Frank Lawford," said one of the disappointed executors. "Till within these six months he stood very well in Mrs. Vaughan's will; and now the very mention of him is like an insult."

"Do me the favor, Mr. Frank Lawford," said Mr. Macintyre, "to see my daughter to the coach, which is at the door. I must know more about this iniquitous will; but this is no place for her."

Catherine prayed him to return with her; but he was already in fierce contention with Morgan.

"I will remain with your father," said Frank, handing her into the coach. "I will not leave him; and with your permission I will accompany him home."

From this day the fates of Catherine and Lawford were bound together.

As Catherine had feared, Mrs. Vaughan's unsatisfactory will greatly affected her father. From that time he never was well; and before he came into possession of the bequest which she had made him, he was beyond the power of enjoying it, had it been ten times the amount. He was gone where the want of money can never give pain, nor the possession of it pleasure.

In process of time news went to the Lawfords of Lawford, that Frank was married to a poor Scots girl, without even family or wealthy connections to recommend her. But by this time Frank's actions had ceased to surprise his family; "and yet," said Mrs. Colville, "this last act has put the finishing stroke to his former extraordinary conduct. Had Frank," argued she, "distinguished himself by marriage, other things, in course of time, might have been passed over; but a false step in marriage leaves nothing to be repaired!"

The father revised his will, leaving merely a small annuity to Frank, much less than to poor Adolphus, who had now sunk into a state of imbecility; and then, in the full belief that all his earthly duties had been thoroughly performed, at the age of eighty-six, went down to the grave of his fathers. Frank was out of England at the time of his father's death, and thus had no opportunity of craving his father's blessing, even if the old man would have given it. He, however, had so long been used to disappointment and trial, that let it come how and when it would he was found, like the true soldier on watch, ready to meet the enemy. A happy man, nevertheless, whether fortune smiled or frowned, was Frank Lawford; for his sound mind, and his sound heart, and the love that surrounded him, as with an atmosphere of heaven, made his life a perpetual rejoicing. His literary career had also been a bright one. He had taken a high and sure place among the noblest minds of his country. Those great truths, of which at first he had been, as it were, the solitary apostle, advanced, and advocated by his eloquent pen, had now rooted themselves into the great national mart, as a part of its own vitality. For all this, his had been an arduous and anxious life; and at fifty-seven all the provision that he had been able to make for his family was the sum of two thousand pounds for which his own life was insured. In a worldly point of view, rich stock-brokers, and bankers, and holders of railway shares, would have said, that he had provided wretchedly for his family. Sad thoughts of the same kind often clouded his own mind; but then, in those dark moments, neither he nor those fat money-bags took into account, that Frank Lawford would leave to his children what money alone would never purchase—fine education, the noblest principles, and his own unblemished name.

CHAPTER VI.

BUT let us now take a peep into that happy home at Kensington, which for so many years he had called his own.

It was Christmas day. Thousands of homes were prepared in London for that day's festivity. The rich feasted the rich, the great feasted the great, and the noble the noble. There was a dinner party also that day at Frank Lawford's, and the whole house had a look of festivity.

Agnes and her young brothers had decorated the walls with evergreens; sprigs of holly, with their clustering berries, peeped out from above the heavy frame of their father's portrait, that beautiful portrait painted by a celebrated painter; a wreath of bay encircled the noble brow of his marble bust, which Chantrey, out of love to the author, had presented to his wife, and which stood among his books, those household gods of his, in his library. But it was in the dining-room that there was most show of festivity; a garland of evergreen wreathed the chandelier, and at four o'clock the window-curtains were drawn, and the lamps lighted, and the side-board shone out, with its glass and plate, and verdant evergreens. The table was spread for twelve; five individuals composed the family: the father and mother, Agnes the only daughter, and the two boys, Arthur a tall manly fellow, who looked fit to combat with the whole world, and little Harry as he was called, more as a term of endearment, than because of his size. Harry was turned eleven, slender in form, and timid in temper, gentle as a girl, and with a soft and delicate complexion, and beautiful wavy hair of a golden brown, which gave an expression of tender beauty to his whole person. He might have been justly painted as a St. John in childhood, and his character corresponded with that of the beloved apostle.

These were the family; the expected guests were seven. An excellent smell of capitally cooked viands came up from the kitchen; the wine was decanted; Mr. Frank Lawford had done it with his own hands, and very good wine it was; excellent port and sherry—none other; and such as he would have given to the best lord in the land. The family awaited their guests in the dining-room, and punctually as the clock struck four the dinner was served, and at that moment the back gate bell rang, not the front bell, and little Harry exclaimed joyfully that they were come! In they came, the welcome guests! and were received at the dining-room door as they came in, and then conducted to their seats.

"Ay, bless you, madam, how good it is of you to do so much for a poor body like me," said the clean, white-haired old man, with the spare form, and the friendly eye, whom Mrs. Lawford placed at her right hand.

"God bless you, sir; and a merry Christmas and a happy new year," said the half blind elderly needlewoman, whom Mr. Lawford placed in the similar seat by him.

"Take the seat near the fire, Mrs. Collins," said Mrs. Lawford, to an emaciated and half-famished-looking young woman, in poor but decent mourning, with an anxious countenance, who led by the hand a pale but intelligent-looking boy, "you will find that seat warm, and Johnny will sit beside you."

With a blush that flushed her melancholy face, and a tear in her eye, she took the offered seat, appreciating the thoughtful kindness of giving her and the boy those seats, for they two were the worst clad in the whole company, and were thus chilled to the bone.

"Here is a seat for you," said Agnes, leading up an old man, a sort of Trotty Veck, in his Sunday clothes, and with a little cheerful face, all smiles and courtesy, like a sunshiny winter's day—"here's a seat for you on my side of the table," said she, placing him opposite the dejected young widow.

Five guests were seated when the last two entered, and were cordially welcomed by all present. The dress and appearance of these last comers indicated much more comfort in home and circumstances than was apparent in that of the others. The one was a man about fifty, of rather a severe countenance, but with, as phrenologists would say, striking intellectual developments. His strong iron-gray hair was cut in a precise fashion, and turned back from his forehead; his deep-set gray eye, which seemed to penetrate with a stoical coldness whatever met his glance, looked out from under a pair of thick shaggy eyebrows; there was, however, an expression of earnestness and heart about the lower part of the face, which somewhat neutralized the stern severity of its upper features. The whole head and face indicated a character in which two opposite natures prevailed, and left the beholder in doubt as to which would be the dominant one. His dress was that of a well-to-do artisan. A well-worn yet not by any means thread-bare suit, showed that he was one that required its duty from everything that belonged to him. He looked like a man who had money for a new suit when it was needed, but who would not buy one until then. With him there entered the room—not leaning on his arm, although she looked as if she knew that to be the mode in genteel society—a young girl of perhaps twenty, his daughter, and the apple of his eye, whose trim and elegant figure gave to her otherwise plain attire a rather modish and—if one may be allowed the word with reference to a poor girl—a distingue air. Her countenance was soft and remarkably pleasing; her fine black hair was smooth and glossy as silk; and the distinct pencilling of her exquisite eyebrows, which in color exactly resembled her hair, accorded beautifully with a rich and peach-like complexion. The eyes, of a deep violet color, had a laughing and rather coquettish expression, to which a little rosy mouth, with its curved and pouting lips, was made to match. At the back of her head, as if with the design of concealing as little of her fine hair as possible, was set a jaunty little cap, modestly but tastily trimmed with pink ribbons. Her dress was black French merino, made tight to the bust, and up to the throat, where it was relieved by a very small, white, fine linen collar. She looked, but for a certain bashfulness, or rather the air of one not quite at her ease, like a young gentleman in her morning dress. These two were William Jeffkins and his daughter Fanny. Fanny had now been in service in the country for six months, and this was her first visit to her father.

Jeffkins and his daughter were evidently, in a worldly point of view at least, the most respectable of all the guests, and accordingly were received by them all with bows and politeness. Every one would have given up their seats to them, more especially the merry old man who sat by Agnes and the half-blind old needlewoman. But the Jeffkins' places had been appointed beforehand, and so the dinner commenced.

Such was a specimen of a Christmas dinner-party at Frank Lawford's; and never could there be more joyous or more delighted guests, or more gratified hosts. It would have been a very convincing argument against any despotism or contemner of the poor, to have witnessed the politeness of these poor people, one towards another. The old man, to whom a good dinner made an era in his life, and who at eighty could count up every good dinner he had ever eaten, begged that "this lady" or "that gentleman" might be served before him—he was in no hurry; and the merry old man, with his white hair and his stiff joints, apologized to his neighbor right and left for beginning to eat before the whole company was served. It would have done anybody's heart good to have seen that humble company, in their poor but decent apparel, sitting at that good man's table as equals with him and his family, for that one day at least.

It was Frank Lawford's opinion that if we would really raise and improve the moral condition of the poor, nay, even the apparently depraved, those in the classes above them, those better instructed than they, must treat them as brethren and sisters. Only let the poor feel that we consider them as children of the same great Father in Heaven, not in word, but in deed, and we shall gain undoubted influence over them. People argued with him that this was true only as regarded particular individuals; but that the lower classes, generally, were too depraved and rude for any friendly or intimate intercourse to exist between them and the refined and pure: that law, and the terrors of law alone, must keep the poor in order. His own experience proved that this was not so true as is generally believed; he knew that the kindness and the friendly countenance of a respectable man may reform even those whom law and its penalties would drag down to perdition. These his poor guests, his humble friends, some of them of many years standing, had been raised, by his Christian love and goodness, from misery and depravity, either in themselves or those with whom they were connected. They remembered him in their prayers; he was their friend and counselor in all their troubles—and the poor have many. He had assisted them, not so much by money as by instilling hope into hopeless breasts; by creating a motive for amended lives; by inducing them to save something, if it were but a shilling—for a man is twice a man when he can call something his own, if it be no more than a three-legged stool. Other friends of this class he had also besides these seven guests, in the same class of society, but they were not here; some, through his means, had emigrated to America, and cheered his heart with pleasant news of their growing prosperity; some were in Africa; and one, let not the rigidly righteous exclaim in horror, among the convicts of South Australia. Yes, and for that man, his heart had bled as for a brother. The man was of a weak yielding nature, and had been beguiled into crime; and the remembrance of Frank Lawford's pity and forgiveness, would work a surer reform in him than his seven years' exile. Such were the every-day acts of this good man's Christian benevolence; they were seen and blessed by the angels of God, rather than trumpeted among men.

Of all his humble friends, Frank Lawford was most attached to Jeffkins: their acquaintance commenced fifteen years before, and not under the most promising circumstances. Mr. Lawford was passing, one summer Saturday afternoon, down a wretched street in the neighborhood of Spitalfields, where he saw a crowd gathered round a drunken woman, whose clothes were almost torn from her back, and whose face was bleeding from a deep gash, which had been caused by her falling on some iron railing. She was still young; and a little girl of about five or six years old, forlorn and ragged as her mother, stood crying beside her. It was a melancholy spectacle. The crowd around was filled with a mingled sentiment of pity and disgust, Mr. Lawford inquired who she was; and at length ascertained that her home was in the neighborhood. The police came in and assisted her away; and Mr. Lawford followed, impelled by the deepest pity. Nothing could be more miserable than the home to which she was taken; her husband, who appeared like herself intoxicated, though not to the same extent, received her with the most bitter curses.

From this unpromising beginning the most fortunate results for the husband and child followed. Lawford soon discovered him to be one of those whom an unhappy marriage had dragged down into the cruellest misery. The wife soon died, but not without a little gleam of better feeling brightening, like the ray of a winter's sunset, the heart of herself and her husband. The wintry day was over; and the morning dawned which ushered in, as it were, a more vernal season, of which it might truly be said, that Mr. Lawford was the sun. A sunbeam of hope had burst into his formerly joyless heart and home; life seemed worth enjoying, but that quite in another way than he had hitherto called pleasure. He was a man of a naturally good understanding; he became a reader, and a thinker also; and being permitted to consider Mr. Lawford, not only his adviser but his friend, he felt himself raised in the social scale; he had become emphatically a man. From that time he was sober, industrious; and, being a clever workman, was able to save money. One master fault, however, he had, which Mr. Lawford in vain combated; this was that natural severity of character of which we before spoke, and which, whilst it made him severe in his judgment on himself, left him wanting in charity and forbearance towards others. In particular was he severe in his judgment of woman; the errors of his wife stood blackly before him, and only forgiven to her through her death. The beauty of his daughter, and her natural gayety of character, excited in him nothing, but fear and foreboding. He believed that he had done well in sending her into service into the country; and, when she was away from him, he thought of her with nothing but pride and affection. Poor Jeffkins! and she was now come back to him for a few days of Christmas holidays; and again he trembled, and was uneasy for her. "She's the lamb of my bosom—she's the joy of my life; and if evil happen to her, it will be the death of me," said he, in his heart, many a time, as he saw her light figure crossing the house-floor, or heard her singing over some little fireside ditty.

Such were Jeffkins and his daughter. But the dinner is now over; and the poor guests blessed God, and their good hosts, for a dinner which had "strengthened, as it were, the very marrow of their bones;" pity only, thought good Mrs. Lawford with a sigh, that we can afford you such a dinner but once a year. And now, while they are left to a little comfortable gossip among themselves, over the dining-room fire, and Mr. and Mrs. Lawford are together in the library, before tea again assembled them, we will hear what information Agnes has gained from her humble friend, Fanny Jeffkins, of her new life in service.

"Yes, Miss Agnes," said she, in the tone of one not intending to take advice, "it is all very true what you may say about stopping in one place, and living with such a quiet, respectable family as the dean's; but I have made up my mind to leave, and then, as I said before, old Mrs. Colville, the late archdeacon's lady, your own aunt, Miss Agnes, who now lives at Lawford with your uncle, let me know through her woman that she would get me a place; she took a deal of notice of me when she was staying at the deanery."

"I have heard a deal about my Aunt Colville from papa," said Agnes.

"Yes, miss, I dare say," continued Fanny, "she is a very nice lady; and her woman Mrs. Sykes told me, that if ever I left my present place, I might have a situation as upper nurse maid at her lady's niece's at Lawford Rectory, and that is among your own relations, Miss Agnes, and is just what I should like. I should live with the rector's lady, and have better wages than at the deanery."

"The rector's lady?" questioned Agnes; "how can that be?"

"Oh, yes, Miss Agnes," continued Fanny, who seemed perfectly informed on the subject, "Miss Lawford, the squire's oldest daughter, old Mrs. Colville's niece, married the present rector—that son of the late rector, and brother, only a great many years younger, to Archdeacon Colville."

"Yes, yes," said Agnes, "you are right; I recollect we heard of the marriage; she is niece, and, at the same time, sister-in-law to my Aunt Colville. But Fanny," continued she, "I must candidly tell you, that I think my aunt did not act right in inducing you to leave your present situation."

"She did not induce me," said Fanny, crimsoning very deeply, "but it is very dull at the deanery; the servants are all old, and there's very little company kept—only just once or twice a year a great party; and I had made up my mind to leave; and so I told Mrs. Sykes, Mrs. Colville's maid, and what she did is no more than one friend might do for another."

"But my Aunt Colville is a very severe and exact woman," said Agnes, "you would be in strict order if you lived with her."

"But," said Fanny, "I am to live with Mrs. Sam Colville at the rectory. I saw her at the dean's party, and Miss Ada, her unmarried sister, the most beautiful young lady in the world!"

"Is, then, my Cousin Ada so beautiful?" asked Agnes with cordial interest, and eager to hear something of those relations of whom she knew nothing.

"She is the handsomest young lady I ever saw," returned Fanny, with enthusiasm: "I helped her to dress, because she did not bring her maid, and she stayed all night. She was dressed in pale pink brocaded silk, and wore a tiara of pearls. Everybody said how beautiful she was; and there was her brother, Mr. Edward, too, in his uniform; he was just then going out to the East Indies, and"—Fanny paused, a peculiar expression passed over her face, and then she continued: "They are a very nice family, Miss Agnes, and I am sure that at Mrs. Sam Colville's I shall find myself very happy."

"If you must leave the deanery," suggested Agnes.

"I have made up my mind to leave," said Fanny decidedly, "and so I let Mrs. Sam know; and to tell you the real truth, Miss Agnes, I am not going back to the deanery but to Lawford at once, and that next week."

"I see, you had made up your mind long ago," said Agnes, smiling.

"Why, Miss Agnes, you see," returned Fanny, anxious to win her auditor to her plans, "it will seem like living at home, to live among your relations; and Mrs. Sam is an excellent lady, and I know that I shall be very comfortable at the rectory. I shall have better wages than at the deanery, and my meals with the children; and I am told that they are such sweet children, and I always was so fond of children, and there is a maid to wait on the nursery. It's quite an upper sort of place, Miss Agnes; and then old Mrs. Colville seems such a very clever, nice lady"—Fanny paused, and again Agnes smiled, remembering the picture her father had so often drawn of his sister Camilla.

Poor Fanny Jeffkins! She deceived Agnes, she deceived her father; perhaps, also, she deceived herself as to the true motives for leaving the quiet old deanery to go and live at Lawford, to take care of Mrs. Sam's children. And why, in speaking of her new situation, and describing the various members who composed the family at the rectory and the hall, did she not mention, either to her father or to Agnes, Tom Lawford, the squire's eldest son, the brother of the beautiful Ada, and of that Mrs. Sam Colville, for whose children she seemed to have conceived so much affection? Poor Fanny! She thought of her own beauty, she thought how she had been kindly noticed, and in part educated by Mr. Frank Lawford and his family. Poor girl! Vanity, and ambition, and the weakness of a tender and trusting heart, had made her listen to false and cruel flatteries, and to foster fond and false hopes. If he were to marry me, thought she a thousand times, his family might forgive him. Old Mrs. Colville took a fancy to me directly. Mr. Frank Lawford and his family have always been my friends. Such things have been before now; and, oh Heavens! if I should ever be Tom Lawford's wife!

The Christmas-day was at an end. The humble guests returned to their own homes, blessing God that there were those who were not ashamed of the poor. The dejected hearts of poor Mrs. Collins and her little son imbibed from that evening a ray of consolation that gladdened and comforted their after lives. Jeffkins and his daughter went home also; but Fanny kept from her father, even more guardedly than she had done from Agnes, any knowledge of the true state of her feelings.

CHAPTER VII.

The next Christmas-day's dinner at Frank Lawford's was not as cheerful as the last. Neither Jeffkins nor his daughter were there, and the cause of their absence saddened the whole party. Yet their names were not mentioned until the guests after dinner were left, as was customary, to have a little gossip among themselves before tea.

"Aye, Lord help us, what a thing this is about Jeffkins and his daughter," said the white-haired old man, with the friendly smile; "what did you hear, Mrs. Bennet?"

Mrs. Bennet, the half-blind old needlewoman, said that she had heard nothing but what Mr. Collins had told her.

All looked to Mrs. Collins, who immediately drawing her chair more closely into the circle, began for general edification.

"Why, you see," said she, "as Mr. Jeffkins has taken Johnny's prentice, I go there now and then; and he, poor man, felt it now and then a sort of relief to open his heart to me; and yet he is naturally a very close man, and most of what I do know I know only through putting one thing to another. Poor Jeffkins! he thought that Fanny was out of all danger, living at a clergyman's, and in the country; and oh! he was so fond of her, and so proud of her, though he is a man that does not show his feelings. Well, all at once the news came that Fanny had left her service, and nobody could tell where she was. He set off in a hurry to Lawford Rectory, but got no satisfaction. She had given a regular month's warning, at the end of a quarter, when her wages were paid, and they were sorry to part with her; but go she would, and she did not even wait for the end of her month. I never saw a poor man so cut up in my life as was Jeffkins; for he is a proud man, and he knew that this setting off in that way could lead to no good. He advertised her, but he got no answer; and all this time he was as still about it, and said nothing to anybody. But my Johnny, whose bed stood in a sort of closet within his chamber, said what nights he used to pass; how he lay tossing and groaning for hours, and then would get up and pray till the very sweat dropped from off him; and sometimes he'd curse just as violently, and threaten what he would do—for he's a stern, savage-tempered man when he's angry, is Jeffkins. He got no answer, however, to his advertisements, and Mr. Frank Lawford, I believe, wrote to his relations at Lawford, but nothing came out. At last, one day a letter came without a name to say, that if he would forgive her, she would come back. He promised he would; and come back she did one evening at dusk hour. I knew nothing of this at the time, or it should have turned out differently to what it did; for I would have taken her home to me and have befriended her. What Jeffkins really expected I know not—he had no right to have expected anything but what he found. But when he saw her condition he would not forgive her; and God knows what might have happened if it had not been for our Johnny. And hard-hearted, unnatural father that he was, he turned her out of doors again, and bade her go to the workhouse, and give birth to her child there. It's my opinion, however, that he never really meant so bad by her. But she took him at his word, and went, not to any workhouse—God knows where she went—and that's two months since. Jeffkins soon repented of what he had done, and now he would give his life to gain tidings of her or the child. He's a complete wreck; neither eats nor sleeps, but goes moping about like a melancholy man. He's punished for his hard-heartedness, and God knows what has become of her!"

"God help her!" sighed the half-blind needlewoman.

"God help us all, poor weak creatures," said the white-haired old man, with tears running down his cheeks.

"Her body will be turning up some of these days," said Mrs. Collins; "for it's my opinion that she has made away with herself."

"God help her!" again sighed the needlewoman.

On his fifty-seventh birthday Frank Lawford gave the finishing stroke to a work which had occupied him for two or three years. It was a work into which he had put his whole soul, and which he believed would be his best gift to posterity.

"Now, Agnes, my child," said he to his daughter, after dinner, "I must read you the last chapter of my book." He said this with a remarkably affectionate tenderness of voice, and, as his daughter looked into his face, she saw that his eyes were filled with tears. She remembered that this was his birthday, his fifty-seventh, and that his mother, whom he had loved so dearly, died at that same age. Agnes was the idol of her father, and his dearest companion; and, young as she was, at least comparatively speaking, he was satisfied with nothing until it had received her approval.

Without noticing her father's emotion—how often she thought of it afterwards!—she linked her arm into his, and accompanied him into the library, that beloved room which seemed a part of her father, and where she, too, the privileged companion of even his hours of study sat and wrote, too, without interrupting him; nay, the father said that it did him good to cast up his eyes from his book and see her form near him. They sat down at his table, he with his lamp before him and his manuscript, and she on a low seat opposite to him, and just at his knees.

"I must read you the whole of my last chapter," said he, laying his hand on her beautiful head.

It was a long chapter, and on a serious subject; it contained a summary of his views on man's duty to man—a subject admirably suited to his pen. It was written from his heart, and was the concentration of the whole spirit of his works, and of his life. Agnes' heart glowed as he went on; she responded to every noble sentiment, and their eyes often met, with an expression of unspeakable affection and union of soul. It was the young disciple sitting at the feet of the master, and hearing for the last time the words of love and wisdom from his lips—oh, what lessons were they to be henceforward!

"When man has faithfully fulfilled his duty to his fellow man, then, and not till then, has he a right to call God his Father!"

These were the concluding words of his argument; and his daughter, with tears of deep emotion in her eyes, gazed lovingly into his face. At that moment a change came over his countenance, and leaning back his head in the large chair in which he sat, he laid his hand upon his heart, whilst a short convulsion shook his frame. Agnes started up. Her scream brought in her mother—Let us be spared the scene which followed: we cannot describe it if we would—the husband, the father—the noble author, at the moment of his work's completion, was dead! He of all men was entitled to call God his Father; and to his Father he was departed!

A night of sorrow, almost of despair, settled down on that lately so happy household. Poor Jeffkins came that night to the house to crave a word of consolation from this strong-minded friend. The servants told him that Mr. Lawford was dead. Without a word he turned away from the house; and somebody saw him after midnight, sitting on the stone-step at the gate, weeping like a child.

The newspapers, of all creeds and parties, announced within a few days, and with honorable mention of his moral and intellectual worth, the death of Mr. Frank Lawford.

"Poor Frank is dead!" exclaimed his brother George, now the fat and for many years gout-afflicted squire, to his family at luncheon. "Poor Frank!" and the tear twinkled in his eye as he laid down the paper.

"Poor Frank," said his sister Colville who sat at the head of the table, "I wonder how he has left his family?"

At that moment letters came in, and among them one from poor Agnes herself to her uncle to whom she had never before written, announcing the sudden death of her father. Her mother, she said, was ill, but nothing could exceed the kindness of her friends; even the very poor, whom her father had befriended, wished, if possible, to do something to assuage their grief. A few words she said on the very best of fathers, on the noblest of human beings—but as she wrote, her tears blinded her eyes, and blotted the paper. The squire wept as the letter was read. "We ought to have done something for poor Frank," said he. "I have often, and of late in particular, been sorry for the coolness between us; we should have remembered that he was our brother." The squire wept bitterly—he had hardly wept more when his wife died.

"We will do something," said Aunt Colville, soothingly. "This poor Agnes, now—what a nice, well-written letter she has sent," said she, also wiping her eyes; "we must see what we can do for her."

The old gentleman wrote a very kind letter back, offered his house to any of them, requested to know of their circumstances, and regretted that his own indisposition prevented his being able to attend the funeral. His son, however, would go as his representative. In a postscript he added, that if his brother had left them in any pecuniary embarrassment, he begged that he might be applied to; and furthermore, he desired to know what family his brother had left, and what prospects they had in the world.

Mr. Tom Lawford attended his uncle's funeral, and carried back the news that men of rank and distinction attended it likewise. Of about a dozen poor mourners who followed the procession, he said nothing, for he knew not of them; they, however, next to his own family, most bitterly bewailed his loss.

"Make way, will you?" said one of the sexton's assistants to a poor man who stood by the grave after the company had moved away, "let's get this earth shovelled in." The person addressed was standing with his arms folded, his hat pulled over his eyes, and was looking into the grave where the coffin lay barely covered with a few shovel-fuls of soil. "By your leave?" said the man, again putting forth his spade. The person addressed heaved a deep groan, and then moved slowly away. "God help him!" said the man, looking after him, and touched by his manner. "I do believe that there lies somebody in this coffin that he loved."

Tom Lawford returned home, and told of the esteem in which his uncle lived; of his really respectable home; of his valuable library; of his fine picture and bust; of Agnes, the only daughter, whose grief for her father seemed so excessive; of her mother, who certainly was a gentlewoman; and of the two fine and interesting boys. Of their circumstances generally, he could say nothing; they were much obliged by the kind offers of his father, but whether they were not too proud to accept of them it was difficult to say.

The head of the family gone, and only two thousand pounds left—what was to be done for the family? Agnes and her mother, with heavy, but yet with trustful hearts, consulted together. In a few days, a letter from the Rev. Mr. Macintyre, Mrs. Lawford's brother in Scotland, arrived to determine their plans. He advised that what little income there was should be devoted principally to the education of the boys at the school where it was their father's wish that they should be placed. He advised that Agnes should, for the present, accept of the invitation from her father's family—to visit them, or to make herself useful among them, as it might turn out; and that, for the present, at least, his sister should come to him. The letter breathed the warmest affection. Mr. Macintyre had been the dear friend of her husband; she fancied now that, could he have spoken, he would have advised the same.

And now the time came when the happy family of the Lawfords was to be broken up for ever. The books, the portrait, and the bust were gone—nothing now remained in the house but that which was to be dispersed among strangers by public auction. Mrs. Lawford was gone with the boys back to school. Agnes had suffered much in parting with them. On the morrow she was to part with her mother, this was her last evening in the home of so much happiness—of so much sorrow. She was seated in the chair in which her father had died, sunk in deep thought, and with her eyes swimming with tears, when the door opened, and the figure of a woman in a large cloak, and with her bonnet drawn over her face, entered. Agnes started.

The woman advanced a step or two, and then stood with down-cast eyes, like a criminal before his judge.

"Fanny Jeffkins!" exclaimed Agnes, with a tone in which surprise and pity were mingled.

"I am ashamed, Miss Lawford, to come here. I am ashamed to look you in the face after what has happened; but I heard by chance that you were leaving London for ever, and I felt as if I must see you again."

"Have you seen your father?" inquired Agnes.

The girl burst into tears, and supported herself against the table.

"Sit down, Fanny," said Agnes, drawing a chair towards the fire, and near her own. "I am glad that you are come—what, now, can I do for you?"

"I cannot sit in your presence," said the girl, after the violence of her emotion was over. "I am very unhappy," she said. "I am a poor, fallen creature, I know; and it has cost me a great deal to make up my mind to come—I did not know how you would receive me."

"I have always wished you well," said Agnes, who had risen, that at least they might thus seem equal; but, oh, Fanny, you must answer me one question—why do you not return to your father?"

Again the girl burst into tears, and remained silent.

"Am I to understand," continued Agnes, "that you do not intend returning to him. If so, why, then, are you here? Am I to ask forgiveness for you? If it be that, how gladly will I do it." She made no answer and Agnes continued. "I do not know how far your life of crime and wretchedness may have hardened your heart, but I cannot believe that you have fallen past recall. Oh, then, Fanny, I beseech of you, by all that is sacred and dear to you, to return to your father; let me intercede between you! I know what he has suffered on your account—we even in the midst of our sorrow, have had tears to spare for him, and he has wept with us; he is a good man, although he may be stern. But only think, Fanny, what you were to him—his all in life—and so as you deceived him!"

The poor girl groaned, clasped her hands, but made no answer.

"Do not close your heart against him," continued Agnes, "when, like the father of the poor prodigal in the gospel, he holds out his arms to embrace you; for if you do, you will have no right to blame anyone but yourself for your future fate, however dark or unhappy it may be; nor otherwise, if your life be such as some say, have you a right to intrude yourself into this house."

The girl sighed deeply, still without replying, and cast a quick and searching glance at Agnes.

"If I seem to speak severely," continued Agnes, "it is from my earnest desire for your welfare and happiness. You are come here for some purpose—what is it? I am sure it must be good. Speak, then, freely. For my father's sake I am sure that your will listen to me, if you wish me to be your intercessor. Tell me, then, what I can do for you. We will not cast you off, although you may have sinned; we are all sinners one way or another before God—He knows what our temptations have been, and what strength we have had to resist them. God often is more merciful than man, but then, having once sinned, we must sin no more, and having to suffer in consequence of sin, we must bear it patiently. Tell me, then, for what purpose you are come, and what you require from me."

Again poor Fanny sighed deeply, and then, as if awakening from a deep trance, fixed her eye on Agnes' face; "I knew how good you were, Miss Agnes," said she, in a tremulous voice, "and I know also—sorrowfully and surely did I know it—how unworthy I am to speak with you. You cannot despise me more than I despise myself; my father cannot love me more than I love him! He thinks I have forgotten him—oh, no. I would lay down my life for him. How have I wished that I could see him in danger of his life, that I might rush in, and, at the sacrifice of my own, save him—that I could hear of his having the plague which would drive everyone from him, so that I might go and nurse him night and day, and die in thus showing my love! Does this look as if I had no love for him?" asked she.

"Fanny," said Agnes, "you wish to show your affection and devotion to him in some wild, improbable way, and such occasions never will occur—but in the simple, easy, commonplace way of going to him, and proving to him your repentance, you will not show it. This is no true affection! What days and nights of unspeakable anguish, worse than any suffering of body, you might spare him, and yet you will not! No, Fanny, deceive not yourself with the idea that yours is true affection—it is selfishness—it is pride—God forbid that it should be ever worse."

"It is an easy thing to judge," said Fanny, in a voice of deep anguish—"it is a bitter thing to suffer! and I have suffered!"

"Then your child also," continued Agnes, "where is it? These are the thoughts which wring your poor father's heart—what is become of your child?—Ah, you have done very wrong, Fanny, you have sadly deceived us all!"

"Miss Agnes," said Fanny, "you and your family have been very good to me, and how much I have loved you, I have no right to say, seeing how fallen and sinful I have been, and how miserable I am! But however," continued she, as if impatient to proceed, "I came here, as you say, for a purpose, and that I must accomplish or die. I have heard that you are going to live altogether at Lawford—that was a fatal place to me! and there are those yet at Lawford whom I would die to save. You will see him, Miss Agnes," continued she in a hurried, agitated voice; "he will love you—he cannot help it—and you will love him, there is no helping it, and oh, when you are his wife," said she clasping her hands, "see that right is done to my poor child. It is there! I was not the unnatural mother my poor father imagined me—how could I? I loved the child too well to have done it any wrong—it was dear to me as an angel of heaven, for its father's sake, unkind as he was to me! At first the thought was bitter to me, of you being his wife—but I am now satisfied: I know how good you are, and for mercy's sake—perhaps even for mine, you will befriend my poor child. Promise me that you will do this!" cried she, coming forward almost wildly.

"You startle me," said Agnes; "and I do not understand you—at least can only dimly conjecture your strange meaning."

Fanny looked at her with a hurried but searching glance, and then said, "you know who I mean; he came to your father's funeral, your cousin, Tom Lawford; you cannot help loving him, but then your love will be fortunate."

"Oh, Fanny," said Agnes, "far wiser would it have been to have confided your child to your own father's care, rather than to the man who had wronged you so cruelly. You have done wrong: you have made your child an outcast. How could you expect that the family would own your child? Your own father would!"

"My father turned me out of doors on a winter's night—turned me out in my misery, and my shame," said Fanny bitterly. "Oh, Miss Agnes, he is a hard, unforgiving, un pitying man; he had no mercy, and no compassion! What was I to do? without a home, in the streets of London, humbled and ashamed, and my child about to be born! Were I to tell you all I suffered, you would never forget it the longest day you lived. The world goes on smoothly, Miss Agnes, smoothly to the rich and the untrodden, and it thinks not on the bleeding and trampled hearts, which misery and an unkind fortune has thrust out under foot! It is easy to talk of sinners; but God only knows what I have gone through; and yet, at times, misery and misfortune have made me almost doubt if there were a God!"

"Do not speak so, do not think so?" exclaimed Agnes, "you only aggravate your sin and your misery by such thoughts. God sees you, and even now, in the person of your sorrowing father, calls you back to him!"

"After my child was born," continued Fanny, "as soon as I was able to travel, I sold some of my things to raise a little money, and set off to Lawford. My child was beautiful, I thought no one could have the heart to cast him off!"

"And yet you could," interrupted Agnes.

"That was not my intention," returned Fanny, "I told his father, in the bitterness of my desertion, that, if need were, I would send it to him; and for my part, I meant to work hard for it. I hoped to get a wet-nurse's place in London when I returned; but I took cold, was laid up with a dreadful fever, insensible for some weeks; and, when I recovered, it was to find that I had fallen amid worse than thieves. I was in bondage to the vilest and the most remorseless. I was with those who have no mercy and whom law could not reach. I was sold, body and soul. I had no hope, and no power to rescue myself. Against my will I was now a sinner. Remorse and despair took hold on me; I felt that now I was a loathsome sinner, and the punishment of sin was on me. I seemed to myself not worth saving—my pride was gone, and my self-respect; and all that I longed for was revenge on my oppressors, and death for myself. I saw my poor father's advertisements; but he had thrust me out when I was comparatively spotless—now I was not worth saving—it was too late! Nothing but death, and the pity and mercy of God could redeem me, and I only said let me die!"

Agnes wept.

"Oh, Miss Agnes," continued Fanny, in a broken voice, "it is a lamentable thing to think of a human being made thus hopelessly forlorn—made thus despicable, thus worthless, through the villainy of others. What is law for, if these things are to be! The queen is a woman like us, and yet there is no pity for us? Great and good ladies, clergymen's wives and daughters, are women like us, and yet on us they have no pity! We are down at the lowest turn of fortune's wheel; and yet, such as I, the betrayed and the unfortunate, are properly objects of pity, and not of anger and scorn."

"I pity you, Fanny!" said Agnes.

"Yes," continued she "you and other good people pity us, as they do thieves and murderers, because they think us willfully wicked, and therefore the most unfortunate of human beings; but I have not been willfully wicked. I loved one too high for me. I was beguiled and deceived; and the loss of my good name, and my father's favor, and the having ruined his peace, was my fitting punishment. My after intention was to be honest and blameless. I meant to work hard for my child and to sin no more. But a power, irresistible as death, took hold on me, under the guise of friendship; and, weak in body and mind, I was dragged down the abyss of infamy and sorrow. God help me! I only wonder that I committed no murder. But my course will not be a long one; the sooner I am gone the better," said she, bursting into tears.

Agnes wept also. "Ah, my poor Fanny," said she, "my heart aches for you; but you must be rescued. Let me send for your father—let me see you ask his forgiveness—let me see you reconciled."

"We shall, we shall be reconciled!" returned Fanny, impatiently. "I will go to my father myself. I know the parable of the prodigal son. I have often thought of it—of going too to my father. I have thought also of putting an end to my own life. I must be grown very wicked," said she, in a tone of the utmost anguish—"very wicked indeed you will think me! but oh, Miss Agnes, this is the last time we shall ever meet, the last time you will ever hear my voice. I shall never again see my child: hear then my prayer," said she, sinking on her knees; "when you are his wife, have pity on my child. Do not be ashamed of the child of an unfortunate mother! You are good: he will refuse you nothing; and so, may God Almighty always hear your prayer; and may no child of yours ever want a friend!"

"Rise, Fanny! rise," said Agnes, "you alarm and distress me!"

"Do not refuse me," pleaded the poor young woman, with eyes full of tears, "or I shall indeed doubt if there be a God in Heaven!"

"All that I can do I will do," said Agnes, tenderly—"but for your child!"

"Plead for it with its unkind father," said Fanny; "plead for it with him as you only can: and keep my secret from all the world!"

"Promise me, in return, then," said Agnes, "that you will go to your father!"

"I will! I will!" said Fanny, rising from her knees. "It will soon be all one to me, whether he is angry or not."

"This night you will go to him!" repeated Agnes.

"I will! I will!" returned Fanny, hastily, and rushed from the room.

Poor Fanny! It was a wild dark night; and, gathering her cloak about her, she ran through the streets, and onward through lane and alley, in the direction of her father's house, which was several miles off; through that vast ocean of life she went, of which she was but one drop of misery and woe. On she went, now feeling as if the pardoning arms of her father's love were enfolding and sustaining her; now, as if that fearful and heart-rending scene of repulsion and outcast, which had thrown her, a wreck, upon the sea of infamy and sorrow, was again to be acted. But a strong resolve drove her on. Now she thought of the woman whose victim she was: the cruel, the unsparing! now of the man whom she had been tempted to murder; and, like a haunting demon, these thoughts drove her onward. "I will go to my father, and will say, I have sinned before heaven and in thy sight; make me as one of thy hired servants!"

At that very time, poor Jeffkins sat in his solitary home, and thought upon his daughter and wept. His anger had not left him, and yet he wept tears of love and pity. "Better to have been childless," groaned he, "than to have been thus deserted! So as I loved her! so proud as I was of her—thus to have been deserted!"

He thought on the years of peace and prosperity which had been; on his little property; on his good name; on his powers of mind; on the little set of whom he had been the head; of the days when he had gone preaching into the country, and his little Fanny had gone with him: he thought of Mr. Lawford, his patron and his friend; of the yearly dinner, and the kind intercourse which that good man had allowed to exist between them. He looked at his little shelf of books, at his writing desk, at the little chair in which Fanny had sat as a child; and, all at once, a gush of tenderness overflowed his heart, and bending his face to his knees, he sat and wept like a child.

But poor Fanny came not. She neared her father's door, and then turned aside. She went far off. It was deep night; no one saw her, or heard her, excepting Him who neither slumbers nor sleeps. A few days afterwards, and the body of a woman was floating along the icy waters of the river Lee. No one saw it; "a jutting bank arrested its course;" it floated into a little cove, among the withered sedges of the last year. They too had had their time of bloom and beauty, and so had she; they were bleached by the weather, and blown by the fierce winds of the unkind wintry season; so was she, by the tempests of misery and misfortune. How like a melancholy funeral pall the gray sedges bend over her! and the strong ice enclosed her in a cold embrace.

CHAPTER VIII.

Her painful interview with Fanny Jeffkins, and the sad and strange history which that poor and unhappy girl had told her, hung like a dark cloud over the mind of Agnes Lawford, as the next morning she journeyed towards her new home. The pain of parting from her mother, and leaving her own home forever, was mingled with sympathy for her poor humble—friend, we were going to say, and friend it shall be, for Agnes was never more her friend than at this moment. The belief that Fanny had really, like the repentant prodigal, gone to her father, was the one cheering ray that brightened the otherwise dark subject. That voice of agony pleading with her, "Be a friend to my child, and keep my secret from all the world!" rung in her ears and in her heart: she determined with herself to wait patiently, and see what circumstances might bring forward; she prayed earnestly, though wordlessly, for help from God, and ability to do that which was best, whatever the duty might be. In this spirit she journeyed on to Leicester, where her uncle's carriage met her, together with that very Mrs. Sykes, of whom poor Fanny Jeffkins had told her. Mrs. Sykes informed her, that her lady was gone out that morning, to make calls with Miss Ada, who was going from home in a day or two on a long visit, and therefore she was sent to meet her. It did not seem a very cordial welcoming of her among them, Agnes thought, and the thought depressed her.

And now, while with a dejected and anxious heart, poor Agnes is making the last ten miles of her journey, let us say a few words to the reader on the exact state of the family, which at this moment, we understand better than he does.

The father had been now for some years a gouty invalid, who rarely left the house. His sister Colville fancied that she saw in him traces of an impaired intellect; but in that she was mistaken. It is true, however, that the more active management of his affairs had now been, for some time, in the hands of his eldest son, that Tom Lawford, of whom we have heard something already: still that argued nothing against the sound state of his mind, however infirm his health might be. His sister Colville, who, since the death of her husband, the learned archdeacon, and of his wife, had resided with him, had taken upon herself the whole internal domestic management, as was sure to be the case wherever she came. Many infirmities, however, he had notwithstanding, which made him willing to yield up the reins of government to any one capable of managing them. Poor man, he required now also much and constant personal attention, and that of a kind which his valet could not give. As he had grown older, he had become much more fond, not of reading, but of listening to books; he extremely disliked being left alone; he wished always to have some with him, his daughter Ada, or Mrs. Colville; but they had no time to spare: and so he fretted and grew peevish, and was a trouble to himself and those about him. And thus his family, who had their own pleasures and their own occupations, were too busy to have any time for him, as well as willing enough to escape from his irritability, and frequent ill-humor.

Mr. Lawford now, as in his younger years he had always done, considered his sister Colville the cleverest of women. Right glad was he therefore, after the death of his wife, that she should take up her abode with him, and thus be the most desirable chaperon in the world for his, at that time, two unmarried daughters. All that "sister Camilla" had done in former years for "poor Adolphus," who was now dead and gone, and without the world knowing much of his deficiencies, remained in his mind as a debt which the whole family owed to her. She had been a mother to Adolphus; and now, it was with no little gratification that he heard her speak of herself as the mother of his children. As a mother, she had already been looking out in the world for suitable settlements and alliances for them.

The Lawfords, however, were not alone the objects of the diplomatic lady's ambition; the Colvilles were so likewise: for if she was a Lawford by birth, she had become a Colville by marriage; and though she had no children of her own, the large family of younger brothers and sisters of her husband had, ever since her marriage, been objects of her care. All had, one after another, been well settled and well disposed of long ago—all, excepting the youngest of the family, Sam, who had been brought up to the church, and had now been his father's curate for some years. The Squire, too, had a son, his second son, Edward, who was destined to the church from his infancy, the appointed future rector of Lawford, when he should have taken orders, and death should have removed the present rector, now well advanced in years. Nobody but the really clever widow of Archdeacon Colville would have known how to manage all points so as to make every one a gainer in this family game at chess.

Nothing, however, was more easy to her than this. Her own brother-in-law, Sam, the present curate of Lawford, should marry her eldest niece, Mildred, and thus, receiving the living as a part of his wife's fortune, two persons were at once provided for. Mildred and Sam Colville had been brought up, as it were, together; the only wonder was that anybody should think of anything else but their marriage. Mrs. Colville had always prided herself on the success of all her schemes; therefore, nothing in this world seemed to her more natural than that her dear old father-in-law should quietly drop off just at the right moment for the young people to have a home ready to receive them. Mildred became Mrs. Sam Colville and a little marriage tour of two months sufficed to put the rectory-house in good order for them.

"What is to become of Edward?" asked his father, when Aunt Colville first proposed to him the marriage between Mildred and her brother-in-law; "don't let us have another 'poor Adolphus' in the family!"

But the warning was hardly needful. Aunt Colville had managed all that. Years before, while Edward was but a boy, she knew that his inclination turned rather to the army than the church; and when Edward, with the quick eyes of youth, saw a lover-like intimacy springing up between the Hall and the rectory, as it had done in the days of the last generation, he opened his heart fully and freely to his aunt, and besought her influence with his father that his destination in life might be changed.

The omnipotent Aunt Colville managed all according to his wishes, and the young soldier embarked with his captain's commission for the East Indies, feeling unbounded gratitude to his aunt, and evincing its continuance by sending to her Delhi scarfs and Indian toys. His career so far had been a brilliant one; and his aunt's favorite phrase was, that "he had engrafted the laurels of military glory upon the old family tree."

Edward, from his boyhood, had been much attached to his young sister Ada, to whom he now wrote of his splendid life in the East, and never ended without saying that should her course of true love not run smooth, or should she find no one to her mind, she must come out to him. It was a favorite joke of Ada's, that she would go to India to her brother; but it was only a joke: neither she nor her Aunt Colville had any ideas of anything but an English husband in an English home. Ada was the pride of her aunt's heart: and, from the first moment of her becoming the head of her brother's household, she resolved that Ada should marry well. She looked round among the county gentry for a suitable husband for her, and none seemed so desirable or so suitable as the one whom destiny, it was believed, had appointed for her. This was their neighbor, Mr. Latimer, of the Hays, a gentleman of large independent fortune, who, having now, for several years, been his own master, had established for himself one of the finest and most unexceptionable of characters. Mr. Latimer was one who, both for his worth and his wealth was universally courted. Any one would have been proud of his alliance; many had striven for it, but he seemed hard to please; he required much, very much in a wife; and, quite aware of his own desirableness to some half-dozen at least unmarried young ladies, still preserved his own unspoiled sincerity of character, and would neither be wooed, nor flattered, nor coquetted into compliance. The world said that he required so much in a wife that he never would be suited, nay, he began almost to think so himself. Aunt Colville, however, was not going to be foiled. She had made up her mind that her niece should, in the end, accomplish that which no one else could. She began even to feel sure of success. People began to congratulate her on the conquest which her niece had made; and she began, even spite of her usual tact and prudence, to speak as if it were as good as settled, when, all at once, to the surprise of the world, and the unspeakable chagrin of Aunt Colville, Mr. Latimer announced his intention of spending two years on his West Indian property. It was very strange, she thought! Two years was so long a period of a lover's life. In two years Ada might be married and gone forever! Could it be possible, after all, that he had no serious thought of her—or was this a ruse on his part to bring the young beauty to terms. She had coquetted with others—she had shown considerable frivolity of character—her anxious aunt had often been displeased and annoyed at her waywardness and petulance in his presence. Had, then, the two years' absence anything to do with this? was it intended to bring her to her senses, or to wean him of a passion which, perhaps, he thought hopeless! Mrs. Colville tried the question in all ways; she redoubled her own attentions to him; talked seriously to Ada; besought her not to let such a lover escape; spoke of the scandal in the neighborhood, of the triumph of this and that lady; and remembered, with secret vexation, how, in the secure pride of her heart, she had been so unwise as to speak of the connection as certain. What if he had heard of this, and was now deserting the field to prove himself free, and leave the lady a free course with her other lovers? Never had Aunt Colville been in such a dilemma before. That no enemy, however, might triumph, she maintained, as much as possible, the old appearance of things,—spoke of "dear Mr. Latimer's departure" as a public calamity; begged him to spend all the time he could possibly spare with them, and took care that he should not lack the opportunity of declaring himself to Ada if such were his wish. It looked exceedingly well that Mr. Latimer spent his last evening at Lawford. Ada was perfectly charming, mild, and gentle, and the very ideal of what Latimer's wife ought to be; but for all that, what did he say at parting? that he had no expectations of finding her Miss Lawford on his return. And thus he left the house, and the next day left England, without declaring his passion, or endeavoring to secure her affections to himself in any way.

Mrs. Colville was exceedingly angry, but she said not a single word either of her anger or her chagrin to Ada; that she kept for her own breast and for Mrs. Sam Colville, who, since her marriage, had risen very high in her aunt's opinion. Ada was too proud, whatever her feelings might be, to express them to any living soul. To the world her aunt spoke of Mr. Latimer as of the dear friend of the family, as of one who had quite a fraternal regard for all the young people; but for Ada she now began to look out for a new connection in the gay world of London, to "which now, for the first time, they went during the season. But a great change seemed to have come over the young beauty. It was the working of a deep, earnest love, her aunt imagined; and therefore, after having again unsuccessfully schemed and planned, she thought it wisest to leave things to themselves, and, in so doing, she returned to her former wishes regarding Latimer. She was convinced that he would not marry while she lived; and in the meantime, the heart which Ada's mind seemed to have taken would only prepare her more completely to fascinate him on his return. All would be well, she doubted not, in the end; but as diplomacy was her passion, she could not help taking some steps to facilitate that end, and those steps were remarkably easy ones. Mr. Latimer's only sister, to whom he was greatly attached, and some was a gloomy one. My thoughts were entirely my own; for a very taciturn and bulky country couple, who were my fellow-travelers, interrupted them by not a single remark. My parting from you, the sense that I had no longer a home, and poor Fanny's unhappy fate, lay like dark and brooding clouds upon my heart; the only little cheering beam was, that the poor forlorn, and yet I trust not God-abandoned prodigal, would that night be restored to her father. Had you not left London so soon after me, you probably would have seen him—"

The next day.—Your letter, which this moment has arrived, distresses and alarms me. Jeffins, you say, has not seen his daughter. Oh, God forbid that she has deceived us; or that she has again fallen into evil hands! Poor Jeffins! his attention to you has indeed affected me. How good, how thoughtful, how really delicate is his conduct. Let no one talk of the bad hearts of the poor! Ah, dearest mother, is it not true, that the gratitude of these poor people has often left us mourning? A dark and sad mystery involves Fanny's conduct; and my heart bleeds for the anguish and agonizing uncertainty, which her father must experience. Here, as yet, her name has never been mentioned. You did well not to speak of the strange secret confided to me. It is safe, too, in my keeping; and God, if he designs me for an agent of good toward that unhappy, deserted child, will make all known to me at the right time. As yet, however, one part of poor Fanny's prophecy seems far from being fulfilled. There is a sort of coldness and distance between my cousin Tom and me. I know why, on my part. I cannot disconnect him, in my mind, from that poor, unhappy girl; and feel, as it were, unpleasantly conscious, in his presence, of the sad secret of which I am the depository. You ask about my cousin Ada. She left home, on a visit of some weeks, the third day after my arrival, and that without our having advanced toward any intimacy. Ada seems to me to be rather a paradox, a mixture of openness, or perhaps impulse, and decided reserve. She says occasionally abruptly kind things, for which one is not prepared, which give the idea that the impulses of her nature are good and kind; but pride, or reserve, or perhaps timidity, make her general conduct cold, and to me repulsive. Our bed-rooms adjoin, divided only by a dressing-room which opens to both, but which she keeps locked. She allowed her maid to pay me all little civilities. I am not an exacting person; I would have been thankful, at that time, for but one kind word or act. As it was, I sat in my solitary bed-room and wept. Do not think me petulant or unreasonable; but my heart, for that first night, was desolate, and felt how great had been its bereavement.

"The family consider Ada very clever. My Aunt Colville says that she is a true genius, and has great intellectual powers. I doubt it—at least so far as original talent goes. Handsome, however, she is unquestionably—nay beautiful. She has a fine, oval, Rutherford face, with those peculiar large, dove-like eyes, which my father called the family eyes, and which I now see are those of dear little Harry—and here I must put in a parenthesis. I have had a letter from those dear boys—a kind, beautiful letter. Arthur says that poor Harry is getting up his spirits famously, and has even had a little fight on his own account. Poor Harry! I cannot tell you how I was haunted by the sad expression of that dear child's face as he sat keeping back his tears, while they waited for the coach. Arthur is so handsome and manly, and so capable of defending himself—but God, and a good brother help poor Harry with his loving, gentle spirit, that never was meant for a tough warfare with hardship and unkindness! So much for a little thought, by way of parenthesis. I now return to my fair cousin Ada. Ada is the darling of the family, in part from being the youngest, in part also from her being so handsome, and from their having the idea of her great abilities. Aunt Colville says very much to me about Ada's powers of mind, and fine character; so also does Mrs. Sam; but as Ada herself, during the short time we were together, rather shunned than courted intimacy with me, and did not betray any great originality of mind in any way; I cannot speak from my own knowledge.

"I hear a great deal said of a Mr. Latimer of the Hays, who is expected in the spring from the West Indies. I suspect him to be the fiance of Ada; it is with his sister that she is now visiting. According to report Mr. Latimer is the very summit of perfection; but when I consider their notions of perfection, which appear to be personified in Archdeacon Colville, I expect—pardon my heresy—nothing more remarkable than good looks—wealth which I know he has—and self-possession—perhaps self-esteem.

"You ask of my uncle, and my aunt Colville. Nothing could be kinder than my uncle's reception of me. I was taken into his room—a sort of inner library, where he spends most of his time. He said very little—but words were not needed; he kissed me—looked into my face, and wept. I wept too—and that abundantly, for my heart indeed was full; and I saw so plainly in my uncle a strong resemblance to my father—that peculiar out of countenance, which made the last generation of the Lawfords so handsome. It was my father's face, only much older and without that expression of superior intellect which gave such a marked character to the face. My uncle wept as he spoke of my father's death, and lamented that 'politics and other things,' had separated them. His heart I am sure is kindly interested in me; and with him, in his little library, I feel at home. He is a great invalid, and suffers much from the gout and other maladies. In his intervals of ease, I read to him. His own children, he told me, do not like reading aloud, nor will they read what he wants. I read to him the newspaper daily. It comes in at breakfast, which is very late; and as we are then altogether, and mostly alone, I read it aloud, and Aunt Colville generally stays also to hear it. If my uncle were too ill to breakfast with the family, I would take it into the chamber, when his chocolate went in, and read it there: but as yet they say he is in unusual health. We read novels, of which he is very fond, and works of divinity; and he pays me the compliment of liking my reading—so did my dear father. Oh, my uncle knows not how often I have had to cheat my poor heart into the belief that I was again in papa's library reading to him! They have none of papa's works here, nor do I believe that they have, any of them, read a single page of his writing. They all hold extreme opinions in religion and politics; and no wonder, when Archdeacon Colville is their apostle. His works are here; thirteen volumes, bound in purple morocco, richly gilt. I was reading one of them one day, when Aunt Colville came in: she seemed greatly pleased, the only time I have ever seen her appear cordially satisfied with me. Her veneration for the archdeacon is extreme; and there are, after all, points of view from which her character is far from unamiable. To me, however, generally speaking, she is cold and harsh; she wishes me to devote myself to my uncle; but I fear that decided kindness towards me on his part will displease her. So also at the rectory—she wishes me to amuse the children, and to gain their affection, but were I, in mistake, to gain that of their mother, she would hardly forgive me. I must be subservient, humble, and useful to every one—I must give love and devotion, but I must look for none in return. Aunt Colville has a great deal of family pride; but the family consist only of herself, and her elder brother, and his descendants: we, if we would please her, must minister to them, we must have no little aspirations on our own account; what little light we have, we must contribute to the family glory; we must sink ourselves to exalt them—and if we will do this, Aunt Colville will be as surely our friend and patron, as ever she was to poor Adolphus. But I must now conclude; I have yet to write to the dear boys. I treasure up every droll anecdote, every conundrum, every amusing trait of character for them, that my letter may amuse them.

"Thank God, that you are so cheerful, and that you are surrounded by so much love, and so much repose! Ah, I once thought that you and I should never smile again; but the year goes on; and the summer, which, in the dark wintry days, seemed so far off, will come with its birds, its flowers, and its sunshine; and thus it is with our hearts! May it only please God, that we, whose hearts are one, may yet form one household; you and I, and those dear boys! I dare not think of it, but try to say, in all submission, Thy will, not mine, be done!

"Adieu, write often to your own "Agnes."

The winter was severe. Christmas came with its carol singers, in the snowy and frosty evenings; the church-bells chimed forth their sweet psalm-tunes; holly and ivy decorated the Hall and the rectory; the doles of fuel and beef were given to the poor; and the county newspaper, as it always did, made a paragraph about the well-known, seasonable munificence of the Lawfords of Lawford. There was a poetical sort of feudal sentiment about this Christmas at Lawford, which had its charm to Agnes; but still she felt, that here the poor and the rich were separated, spite of seasonable gifts, by a wide gulf, which no sincere kindly sympathy bridged over. Very different was all this from those little festivals of human love and human brotherhood which each successive Christmas had seen under her father's roof.

"I will take you with me this morning," said Aunt Colville to Agnes, on the day when the doles were distributed; thinking to impress her with the munificence of the great branch of the family.

Aunt Colville, enveloped in velvet and fur, sat in the great carriage, and Agnes took her seat beside her. She was in a very gracious mood, and as they drove along, pointed out the Grammar School, and the Alms-houses which had been endowed by the family.

"It is a proud thing," said Aunt Colville, "to be the main branch of an old line of ancestors—the direct family line, I believe, has no stain upon it—all its men were men of honor, who served their God and their king zealously and unflinchingly; and their women were noted for beauty and purity. I am proud of being a Lawford," said she with dignity; "and though, in the last generation, we had cause to deplore some things connected with the family, yet the main branch has ever retained its uprightness."

Agnes felt that a sting was contained in her aunt's words, and perhaps she might have replied, had they not now reached the village, from whence the church-warrens and other off-lands were distributing the spurs' bounty; and as the great family coach slowly drove among them, hats were taken off, and a hurra welcomed them. Women, with children by the hand, or at the breast, were carrying away the cuts of beef; and men and big boys were whirling away coals in barrows or hand-carts. Everybody looked eager, but by no means was there an expression of universal satisfaction on every face. Many were discontented; they believed that their neighbors were better supplied than themselves; they looked angry and envious.

"Yes," said Aunt Colville, as she sat in the great family coach, glancing through its plate-glass windows at the discontented faces around her, "it is a privilege to belong to the better classes of society, for there is a natural depravity and hardness about the poor."

"Pardon me, aunt," said Agnes, eager to vindicate the poor as a class, "but society has always dealt so hardly by the poor, it has made poverty and crime synonymous. The rich and the poor are not bound together by deeds of kindness and a spirit of brotherly consideration and forbearance: but they are separated by severe laws and enactments, which the rich have made to keep the poor in awe. Oh, aunt, is it not enough to harden and sour the very heart of poverty, when it craves from its fellow man the leave to toil and that is denied it?

Instead of accusing the poor of natural depravity, I only wonder at their forbearance and patience. What can the poor do in such cases but sink into despair, and out of despair plunge into crime, and then when we have made them criminals, we drive them further from us by severe penalties. We make ourselves their oppressors—what wonder then if they hate

“There are churches open for them,” said Aunt Colville, “and the influence of the Bible and democrats. I know what the poor are, and great deal more about them than you do. It is hardly worth while arguing the subject, but still I must say a word or two: for instance, you say that the rich do not bind the poor to which, you are witnessing? what was it that I saw? I saw a man who had been a fish. I took care, at least my excellent father roughly. He disseminated tracts; put down which are frequented by the lowest and of the parish, and established among an association for employing none but attended church regularly, and sent putable characters. It is per-

I can safely testify, that there is

“It seems to me,” returned Agnes, in a tone

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“My dear child,” said Aunt Colville, “I

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“I have seen many a poor man, and

“For heaven's sake,” interrupted Agnes, “do not say one word against my father. You know of your own

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

“I wish not wantonly to hurt your feelings, Agnes; but you ought to know, that your poor

her easy graceful manner—and one cannot deny her all these—while she holds such opinions, even if she wanted a situation to-morrow, I could not give her one. Sam is so fond of

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

Agnes was set to read the first volumes of Archbishop Colville's “Tracts on Religious Opinions.” It was a very heavy book; but

"But little Johnny is not your son?" inquired Agnes.

"In one sense, no," said the woman, "and that is all the more distressing to me. You see, miss, my own baby died—we were in the poor-house, for ours has been a hard life—and as this had no one to own it, neither father nor mother, I took it for my own. My husband was as good and well-meaning a man as ever trod in shoe-leather when we married; but he offended the squire and the rector with joining a political club in Leicester. He was a reading man, and was much sought after at clubs and ale-houses, because he could speak very well. He was then a sort of under-bailiff on the squire's farm. But envious folks told him of him to his employer and the rector; and he was young and thoughtless in those days, and would not be warned to avoid even the appearance of evil; so he lost first one place, and then another. And the squire's harshness and severity, and the rector's together, awoke in him a spirit of hatred and ill-will. We had children, and we fell into poverty: one article of furniture after another was pawned and sold to get us bread. Nobody would give my husband a character; and our very neighbors, who had known us in our better days, looked shy on us. Oh, miss, kindness and confidence keep up a man's self-respect more than anything else! We came soon to feel as if our being poor had degraded and debased us! My husband went to Leicester to get employment, but none was to be had. He came back, after an absence of some weeks, furnished. It was winter-time: we had four children then living—when my husband had left home there were five; but one had died while he was away, and the parish had buried it. I expected that my husband would have grieved sorely, but he did not; he shed not a tear: he only said that he wished the other four were under the sod with little Bessy. I was expecting to become a mother again almost daily; we had no food; house-rent was going on; we were in despair; and oh, God help the poor who are driven to despair! It was winter-time—a black, bitter frost—and we were dying of cold and hunger. My husband had become reckless, and almost ferocious. He called the rich tyrants; and ground and gnashed his teeth when he heard the children cry. My time approached, and I went to old Mrs. Colville to beg help: but she sent me word that she could believe none but persons of good character. At that moment the children, who had gone out to beg, came home crying from cold and hunger. My husband was roused to fury—he went out swearing a fearful oath. The next day we had plenty to eat; we fasted—us and the children: God knows how we had needed food before. The third day after that my husband was taken up for a poacher, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment and hard labor, and we were taken into the house. In the midst of disgrace and poverty, and distress of mind, my child was born. The night that it was born I heard the woman talking of a young child which had been found at the Hall gates!"

Agnes started at these words, and breathlessly awaited for the continuation of the woman's story.

"It made a great talk in the house," she continued; "some said one thing and some another, but the squire sent the child to the house, and old Mrs. Colville came here. She was very angry, and said that it was a proof of the wickedness and hard-heartedness of the poor, because this child was abandoned by its mother. Some of the poor folks in the house sided with her, and others took against her. I, for my part, who had gone through so much, thought not danger, such as we had felt, had passed about the heart of this child's mother against it, and I had pity on both it and her. There was nobody in the house to serve a hot meal. They gave me good food, and plenty of it, and my bodily strength soon returned, but my own baby was sickly, and died. My heart ached at the thought that had no mother to cherish it, so I gave to it my baby's name, and said that it should be mine in the place of the one I had lost. Nobody made any objection—Mrs. Colville even approved, and sent to me then a bundle of baby-clothes."

"At length the time came when my husband's imprisonment was at an end. He returned home—if home that might be called which was no more than a roof to cover us. The six months of his imprisonment had changed his very nature. He had associated with men ten times worse than himself; he knew now that he was a branded man, and he was in reality depraved. The severest misery that I endured was in perceiving the change that was come over him. When he heard that my baby was dead, and that in its stead I had adopted another, he was very angry. He refused to let me have it—he threatened to tear it from my breast. It was not ours, he said, and we would not burden ourselves with it. The child was dear to me as my own flesh and blood!—The poor woman paused; she wiped the drops of sweat which stood upon her brow, and seemed overcome and repressed by the remembrance."

Agnes listened in breathless interest, and without saying a word, wiped away her own tears.

"It would have broken my heart," continued the woman, after a few moments, "to have parted with the child; but, fortunately, a letter came from some unknown hand, offering to my husband the sum of ten pounds on condition of his adopting the child, and removing from the parish. Ten pounds to a man is my husband's circumstances was a sufficient inducement to do even more than this. He laid in a little stock of such articles as are used in country-phases, and we began our life of wandering. Success attended us—but my husband was no longer the open-hearted man he had been. A hard, cold, gripping spirit had taken possession of him; he hated the rich, and had neither compassion for, nor faith in the poor. We now travel about from place to place. The life suits him and the boys. I took cold the first winter we were out; for it is positively cold of nights in the caravan. He has had associates, and is brutal and cruel. He never has liked the child, God knows why, though it was the means of his having a livelihood in his hands. When I am gone, it will have a hard life among them."

"But," said Agnes, "you have a daughter, a kind-hearted girl, who loves the child."

"Ah, miss," said the mother, with a deep sigh, "my husband will bring a step-mother to the caravan—I know it all! I have seen her, a stout, strapping quack, the head taller than me. She was in jail when my husband was there, and Heaven knows how she has gained so much influence over him. She has offered to come here to nurse me, and take care of the children; but no!" said she, raising herself, and with an almost fierce expression in her hollow eyes, "let her come into the caravan if she dare, while the breath is in my body!"

There was something desperate and almost savage in the woman's tone and manner; and the little child that was playing on the floor of the caravan, looked up in her face, and, terrified, began to cry. Agnes took him on her knee, and soothed him; she stroked his hair, and caressed him tenderly. This then was the child which had been committed to her care and love, by his unhappy mother. His father, as the letter from the unknown hand and the ten pounds proved, had acknowledged his claim. She fancied that in his clear eyes and his peach-like complexion, she could trace a resemblance to his wicked mother. A deep sympathy, an inexpressible tenderness towards him, thrilled her heart, and while her tears fell upon his curling hair, she clasped him in her arms, and he no longer afraid, looked up into her face with the beautiful confidence of childhood, and smiled.

"God knows," said the poor woman, as if suddenly awake to a new idea, "if I have done well in talking thus freely to you of our affairs. I know not how I came to do so; but surely, miss, you will not in any way betray me?"

"Indeed I will not," said Agnes, in a tone of warm sincerity, "and I will come again to see you, nor will the child be unshared for: God will send him friends!"

With these, and other such words, she took her leave; and the woman, assuaged and somewhat comforted by her presence, watched her through the open door of the caravan till the windings of the lane concealed her from sight.

This strange and unexpected discovery agitated Agnes greatly, and as she hastily pursued her way back to the Hall, she endeavored to ascertain what was for her the best mode of action; but she could not decide, and with her mind still in a perfect tumult of feeling, she reached the Hall, amazed and half-alarmed to find how long she had been absent. Her Cousin Tom's groom waited at the door with his horse, and the ladies were returned. As she passed the drawing-room door, she heard an eager discussion among them, and presently Ada's voice, which said, "There is Agnes, ask her."

She was called in, and found the table and sofa covered with materials for splendid evening and ball dresses. Old Mrs. Colville and the young ladies were making purchases for a grand party, which was to take place in the neighborhood in about a fortnight, and by which time it was expected that Mr. Latimer would be returned. Tom was with the ladies, and there was now a difference of opinion with regard to Ada's dress, whether it was to be a silver gauze over pink satin, or a gold-primed muslin over white. Ada, secretly remembering the night at the deanery, when she wore the pink brocade, and made so much impression on Mr. Latimer, inclined to a dress of the same color; her brother, Mrs. Sam, and Miss Bolton, advocated the white.

"Here is Agnes, let us hear her opinion," said Tom, who from the window had seen her approach.

"There is no need to ask her," said Aunt Colville.

"There is Agnes, ask her!" said Ada, without noticing her aunt's words, as she heard her step on the stairs.

Agnes was called in, and the important question proposed to her, and the respective elegancies of each dress dwelt upon at some length.

Poor Agnes! she was in no state of mind just then, to enter fully into the merits of a ball-dress; besides which, she was alarmed to think of having apparently neglected her uncle so long.

"They are both beautiful," said Agnes; "I do not know indeed to which to give the preference."

"But which do you think will suit Ada the best?" asked Miss Bolton.

Agnes considered for a moment, glancing first at her beautiful cousin, and then at the two dresses as they hung side by side; "I think the pink would suit her best," said Agnes, "but now indeed I must go."

"Stop!" cried Tom; but Agnes went, and then turning to his sister he inquired if Agnes would not be of the party.

"How can she?" said his aunt, impatiently. "She must stop at home with her uncle; you know how difficult he has been to manage this morning; it is thoughtless of her to go out in this way!"

Tom began eagerly to say that his father had not been impatient; and that his having got out in his bath-chair was a very good thing; and then, again turning to his sister, he inquired whether Agnes was not to be of the party.

Ada said she did not know; she had not been invited; but there was no objection to her going with them.

"My dear," interrupted Mrs. Colville, "how can she go in her morning which is very shabby? Poor thing! she would be very uncomfortable in such a party."

"Ladies can dress themselves with a deal of taste and elegance even in morning," said Tom, pertinaciously.

"Certainly," said Ada, "and if Agnes really were going, there are some beautiful things even here which would be very becoming to her. Suppose, went, we were to buy her one."

Jeffkins' child, her thoughts fixed themselves upon that subject; and entering upon the fallen tree, as she had done on that former occasion, she began to ponder upon the strange destiny which had linked her to this little friendless human being and to disaster, if she could, a gleam of light, which, amidst the utter darkness which at present enveloped her, should point out the true path of her duty regarding it.

As she thus sat, her cousin Tom rode slowly up the little bridle-path through the dingle. He looked unusually handsome and gay, and was looking his riding-whip in the excitement of animal spirits. He did not see Agnes; he had not the least expectation of meeting her there, and the lady beside him, as he passed; and, occupied by his own thoughts, which, whatever they might be, seemed happy ones, he never looked behind, and Agnes, with a flushing cheek and a suddenly-beating heart, watched him till he was out of sight.

It was a small incident; but at that moment it caused a great agitation in her feelings. "Almighty Father," prayed she, inwardly, "preserve my heart from sliding into any unworthy passion. Give me grace to know what is thy will, and ability to do it. Be thou my friend and comforter; for beside thee I have none!"

She rose up, and walked on in the direction opposite to that which her cousin had taken. She took the path which led to the unquartered woodland lane, and presently came to a little sylvan nook, where bubbled up a remarkably fine spring, which was said to possess medicinal virtues, and to which the country people came for water from a great distance. A little girl was filling a bottle as Agnes came up; she was stooping, and it was not until she rose that Agnes recognized her to be the girl from the caravan.

"Oh, miss," said the girl, her countenance suddenly lighting up, "I am so glad to see you. Mother is so badly, she cannot get up now, and I've come to this spring to fetch her some water; they say it is good for sick folk!"

"I have been to seek for you before," said Agnes; "but you were not in the lane."

"We've been out for a week," said the girl; "but mother's so bad again, and she would come back, for she says she shall die!" — The girl said no more for weeping, but trailed on with her head, wiping her eyes, as she went, with the corner of her ragged shawl.

"And how is the baby?" asked Agnes, cheerfully, walking quickly to keep up with the girl.

"Oh, miss," replied she, and cried more than ever.

"Is the baby ill or dead?" asked Agnes, alarmed.

"No, ma," said the girl; "but when mother's dead what's to become of us? Father does not love the baby; it makes him cross daily to hear him laughing."

"God will provide for him," said Agnes, trustfully; and, without another word, they walked onwards.

A strong-built man, with a curly, sun-freckled countenance, in a faded velvet jacket, and leather leggings, was looking together the feet of a heavy, ill-conditioned horse, which he seemed to have reined from a smaller caravan as Agnes approached. A stiff and disagreeable-looking gentlemanly spring, looking directly, to meet her as far as the chain would permit. At this the man turned round.

"The lady's come to see mother," said the girl, timidly. The man touched his hat and without saying anything, but whether in good or ill-will it was impossible to say. Agnes followed the girl up the steps of the caravan, hoping that her well-known-looking father would not join them. The door of him, however, left her when she saw the party, and he disappeared to her dissatisfaction, continuance of the poor woman.

"The poor lady's come to see mother," said the girl, looking down to the caravan, and on which she sat.

The woman spread her eyes and welcomed her cousin with a faint smile, as the man came over a lady-like form, and said, "Dear, dear" the quilt, and the baby, reined out of a rosy slumber, looked around him with gravely wondering eyes. The man, in the meantime, had seated himself on the steps of the caravan, and began smoking from a short and very much discoloured pipe.

"Shut the door, Mary," said the woman, "for the smoke is enough to poison one."

The girl shut the door, and, taking up the child, sat down with him on a three-legged stool. Her mother, however, bade her take him out, and Agnes and she were then alone together. She then raised herself in the bed; and fanning her now flushed face with an old handkerchief, thanked Agnes for thus visiting her. "I have thought a deal about you," said she, "and I don't know what it was that made me at once open my heart to you as I did."

"I wish to be your friend," said Agnes.

"God bless you!" returned the woman. "I am not long for this life; but there are some things which are very hard with me. I have made my husband promise that when I die, he will bury me in Lawford churchyard by my own father and mother. They were decent folks and have a gravestone of their own. It may not matter to me after I am gone, but it would make my end easier to know that I should lie near them; for that reason we came here. My husband hates Lawford and all the folk in it, and we've suffered sorely, sure enough, among them; but, for all that, I must be buried in Lawford churchyard. Another thing, however, is hard; he won't let me send for the clergyman, for it's old Colville's son who helped the squire to put him in jail, and brought all our troubles on us! But God help me! and I to die without the sacrament, or so much as a prayer read beside me! Oh, miss, I never thought to have died like a beggar in a ditch! And then there's the baby," continued she, as if her pent-up heart must vent all its troubles. "As I told you, it's rightly mine—God knows whose it is! But my husband consents that it belongs to the Hall; and though as it were, we were paid to take it, he hates it because he hates all the Lawfords; and she that is to be my children's stepmother when I'm gone, will be the death of the child."

Agnes thought of the early-mentioned man, and his hatred to all the Lawfords, and a shudder ran through her; but of this she said nothing. "God will find friends for the child," she replied; "for not, but put your trust in God, and He will provide friends for both."

There was an earnestness and an assurance in her voice which fixed the woman's attention, and looking at her, she waited as if for further comfort.

"I can say," continued Agnes, the hand of God at work for you; only put your trust in Him; repine not, but believe Him to be your God and your Saviour. You have got confidence in me; put confidence then in Him, who may make me the humble instrument of His mercy to you."

"I said that you were an angel of God," returned the woman, "and I could not help opening my heart to you. Send the only good man to pray by me—some good clergyman to administer the sacrament. But let it not be a Colville!"

Agnes thought, as she bid her from the door, of poor Jeffkins. "I know a good man," said she, "but he is no clergyman, although, as a Methodist, he has preached up and down among the poor in country places. He has suffered much, and can sympathize with sorrow and misery."

"And where is he?" asked the woman, eagerly.

Agnes said that he was in London.

"God help me!" returned the poor woman, in a tone of disappointment. "Is there no good man nearer than London?"

"This is the man whom you must see, this is the man who will be your father and mother to the child when you are gone," said Agnes,

"only for the present, put confidence in God, and in me!"

"And who are you?" asked the woman; "and why do you thus care for me?"

"My name is of no consequence," returned Agnes, remembering the hatred which the woman's husband cherished to all who bore the name of Lawford; "I know only this, that God will send you comfort through me!"

With this Agnes, after promising to come again, if possible, took her leave; the man was gone from the steps of the caravan, but the ugly dog growled at her as if in the spirit of his master.

It was with quite different feelings that Agnes, on her return, thought of the great party at Morley Park, and of the mortification which she had endured only a few hours since regarding it. That part of her duty which had hitherto seemed to her dim and inexplicable now began to reveal itself clearly; she blessed God that His hand seemed thus unexpectedly leading her to Christian acts of love and service. All craving of her own personal indulgence was appeased; a light and cheerful spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion to others infused new vigor into her mind, and made it easy to say, "Thy will be done."

The dinner, however, at the Hall was short and constrained. The only one who seemed quite at his ease was Tom, who laughed and talked with more than his usual gaiety. Asks who expected within so few hours to meet Mr. Latimer, was silent and thoughtful; so also was her father, who, though he had overcome his excitement of temper, and who knew, on reflection, that it was no use opposing his sister, yet thought it only right for the sake of his own dignity to keep up some show of resentment. Whilst Mrs. Colville, as was always the case on such occasions, attended to the proprieties of the table with the greatest of decorum.

The ball-going part of the company went to dance.

"Where is Agnes?" asked Tom, as Mrs. Colville, beautiful as human skill could make her, came into the drawing-room, ready dressed.

Agnes at that moment entered, anxious to show her fair cousin that she could feel sympathy and interest in a pleasure of which she was not allowed to partake.

"Why are you not dressed, Agnes?" asked Tom.

"She stays with my father," said Agnes. "It is most noble and wonderful of her!" continued she; "and I wish, Tom, you could have seen how charming she looked in her new dress. I wish you were going, Agnes, I wish, indeed, from my soul that you were," said she, withdrawing her with such mental outcries of woe as she had never shown towards her father.

Agnes was taken by surprise, and the tears sprang to her eyes; "I cannot wish it now," said she; "indeed, dearest Agnes, I cannot! These words of yours, this kindness of yours, which my disappointment has won me, are worth twenty baubles."

"It is very strange," said Tom, in a confidential voice, "that my father cannot spare you for one evening only!"

At this moment Mrs. Colville entered, dressed and perfumed like a lady of distinction, and as she came in, she said that the carriage was waiting. All three went down stairs. Agnes stood at the window, and saw them in the first moonlight of the summer evening, drive away. She watched the carriage till it was out of sight, and felt in the bottom of her heart a blank when she saw it no longer.

Her mother had said at the morning, that he did not want her that evening. "When you ever see me alone in the little library, he has as if he could not do without her." "I shall go for her," thought he so himself, and so he did. He was waiting, Agnes entered. He was extremely glad to see her; laughed as merrily and even as if he were in joke, and about nothing at all that night of the morning, and of the afternoon, and of the early part of the night, which had between them that mutual power of attraction which, with an influence mysterious and irresistible as his difference was in herself; but a mere truth, a word, a manner which could not be described, but must be like the devotion of a lover—these were the counter- not wrong when she said that our happiness was influenced by trines. The marvellous feather After breakfast two events occurred which had refer- for her to the back-gate. A little girl brought it, and conveyed at once to Agnes in her own chamber. She recognized the handwriting instantly to be that of the note consisted of but a few words, and was an urgent request that she would see him in the dingle at the bottom of the park, at four o'clock.

concealed from the thickly conveyed at once to Agnes in her own chamber. She recognized the handwriting instantly to be that of the note consisted of but a few words, and was an urgent request that she would see him in the dingle at the bottom of the park, at four o'clock.

with his favorite child or "Tramp, Mr. Sam, I'm the right man for you, Sam!" asked the man, suddenly stopping them. "Heart seemed to stand still, and then the blood

God! "Oh, its of her

His own connection gave the information

Here, and where he comes thought that it must have reference to Jenkins, and her acquaintance with the people of the caravan; and she went down, not knowing how she could clear herself, where so much had to be concealed. But they were not frowning faces that met her; and, on the contrary, they looked quite smiling and deprecating. Mrs. Sam began by an- she really did not know, she said, how to regret at this untoward circumstance, and her that Agnes would come in after dinner for tea.

"Agnes and I will have tea together!" said her good old uncle, remembering how amusing Agnes could be when they two were alone together in an evening.

"Yes," said Agnes, "we will have a pleasant evening together."

libors. were of the rarely spirits heart Agnes to put

Agnes. "they tends, or amuse you," returned Mrs. Sam. "think you will not refuse Mrs. Sam so small a re- " said Mrs. Colville.

shall do just as she likes," interrupted the old gentleman; "if at the time she incline to go, she shall go; if not, she shall stay away, and nobody shall be of-

Th-

packages in her that letters. No

and con- fered off my in his large. "all t-

that I should when I think been rough- nabet of my

My very I believe- get that suffering.

between them that mutual power of attraction which, with an influence mysterious and irresistible as his difference was in herself; but a mere truth, a word, a manner which could not be described, but must be like the devotion of a lover—these were the counter-not wrong when she said that our happiness was influenced by trines. The marvellous feather

After breakfast two events occurred which had refer- for her to the back-gate. A little girl brought it, and conveyed at once to Agnes in her own chamber. She recognized the handwriting instantly to be that of the note consisted of but a few words, and was an urgent request that she would see him in the dingle at the bottom of the park, at four o'clock.

that she could be with him at the dingle, nearly a mile from the Hall, at four o'clock, for perhaps a long and in time to dress and go to the rectory for dinner at six? It was impossible! She turned it over all ways in her mind, and nothing but perplexity came out of it. In the midst of this she was summoned down stairs to see Mrs. Sam, who wished to speak with her. But in the first place, she must say that this lady and Mrs. Colville were not quite satisfied with Mr. Sam, and yet were very reluctant his eye dwelt rather more upon than upon her cousin; and for this (people are so very unreasonable sometimes!) they blamed Agnes. She tried to attract his attention, they said, and for that reason she must not go to dinner to Mrs. Sam's. But we will now see what that lady had to say for herself: she and her aunt Colville were together in the little library where Agnes was desired to come. Agnes thought that it must have reference to Jenkins, and her acquaintance with the people of the caravan; and she went down, not knowing how she could clear herself, where so much had to be concealed. But they were not frowning faces that met her; and, on the contrary, they looked quite smiling and deprecating. Mrs. Sam began by an- she really did not know, she said, how to regret at this untoward circumstance, and her that Agnes would come in after dinner for tea.

"Agnes and I will have tea together!" said her good old uncle, remembering how amusing Agnes could be when they two were alone together in an evening.

"Yes," said Agnes, "we will have a pleasant evening together."

libors. were of the rarely

spirits heart Agnes to put

Agnes. "they tends, or amuse you," returned Mrs. Sam. "think you will not refuse Mrs. Sam so small a re- " said Mrs. Colville.

shall do just as she likes," interrupted the old gentleman; "if at the time she incline to go, she shall go; if not, she shall stay away, and nobody shall be of-

Th-

packages in her that letters. No

and con- fered off my in his large. "all t-

that I should when I think been rough- nabet of my

My very I believe- get that suffering.

came into the room at the same time. Her heart, glowing warmly with tightly in her folded hands pondered upon resolves which lay deep within her own soul.

which, on the opening of Edward's packages, the

"Where is Agnes?" inquired Ada also, as taken with India muslins and scarfs, some resembling in texture dragon-fly's wing.

nearly an hour before walking through the shrubbery impatience of temper Ada carried the things into her boudoir.

Agnes was punctual to Jenkins's appointment. The fallen tree lay a little aside from the road, closely concealed from view by the heavy trees and underwood, red and whitened hair; his wrinkled, and care-worn, and haggard countenance; his stooping, enfeebled fig-lured Jenkins of former years! But she was a surprise! at all this; she had seen the beginning of the pulling down of his human strength and pride before she left London; and the sad terminating scene of the tragedy must necessarily have ploughed too deeply into heart and frame not to have left indelible traces. A faint expression of pleasure, a smile it could not be called, leamed over his countenance, like the pale sunshine of a winter's day; and that expression was infinitely touching. It came for a moment, and then was gone again; and Agnes saw how unused that face was to any shadow of gladness. He did not offer his hand at first, nor did he trust his voice to utter a word. Agnes, however, closed hers with a gentle hintness that called tears to his eyes. He grasped her hand and turned aside his face to weep.

at once to face the subject for which they met. "Thank heaven! you have found them—poor Mrs. Murchment and the child!"

"May the Lord reward you!" said he. "suffered a deal! The child is like me, God in heaven! I thought it would have killed me when I saw it first; the same complexion; the same eyes; the same expression! But—" and here he her young life with him man who has made me life—who has filled me and con- fered off my in his large. "all t-

that I should when I think been rough- nabet of my

My very I believe- get that suffering.

and con- fered off my in his large. "all t-

that I should when I think been rough- nabet of my

My very I believe- get that suffering.

and con- fered off my in his large. "all t-

that I should when I think been rough- nabet of my

My very I believe- get that suffering.

and con- fered off my in his large. "all t-

that I should when I think been rough- nabet of my

My very I believe- get that suffering.

now faster than ever; and now," said she, looking at her watch, "it is half-past twelve."

It rained all day; there was a damp, chill, comfortable feeling in the house, which made people think of the delights of a fire as the day wore on. In the afternoon a servant came over from the Hays with a note from Mr. Latimer to Mrs. Colville, full of regrets for the untoward opposition of the elements, together with two remarkably fine pine-apples. The pinery at the Hays was noted for the fine quality of its fruit. Mrs. Colville read from the note that Mr. Latimer hoped that Ada would accept them. Heaven knows if the words were really in the note, for the old lady put it in her pocket as soon as she had finished it. Poor Ada! she almost forgave the rain.

"It's very pretty of Mr. Latimer to send Ada the handsome pines," said Mrs. Colville to her brother, as they all sat at tea together before a fire which was lighted in the little library. Ada divided one of the pines that evening among them. She was unusually lively and amiable.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE next morning Tom Lawford made his appearance at home, and Mrs. Colville had a private conversation with her brother; but one subject is quite enough at a time, and we will take them in the order in which they occurred.

Tom received the congratulations of his family with a very well-satisfied mien; one little remark, however, of his father's disconcerted him.

"I consider," said he, "Miss Bolton a very charming girl, and perhaps a little too good for you; she has a handsome fortune and good connection; I have nothing to say against the match. It is time you got married, and you have my entire consent; but I had hoped, Tom, that we might have done your poor uncle some little justice by providing for his daughter amongst us. Rich women are not uncommon, nor handsome ones either, but such girls as Agnes are uncommon. But fathers must not choose for their sons; and so, God bless you, Tom, and give my love to Henrietta Bolton."

His voice was broken, and the tears rolled down his cheeks. His son seized his hand and grasped it, and left the room without speaking.

After he was gone, Mrs. Colville came in; and Tom, expecting to find her sister alone in the dining-room, went there, but Agnes was with her. He started; but, mastering the emotion, whatever it might be, which he felt, he said in a tolerably firm voice—"I am obliged to leave home again for a week; my business in London is unfinished; you can tell my aunt and my father—Good-bye!"

He had hardly glanced at Agnes; he did not speak to her. His conduct was natural, perhaps, but it troubled and distressed her.

"I must leave this place," again said she to herself, "this is his home, and I drive him from it!" She dreaded announcing her departure to her uncle; and indeed, to her, the parting from him was very grievous. But, however, this little incident with Tom decided her to a prompt and firm fulfillment of her duty. "When I go to him, after luncheon," she said, "I will tell him, when he and I are quite alone together."

In the meantime, as we said, Mrs. Colville is having an interview with him.

"Brother!" she began, seating herself beside him, almost before his nap was ended, "I have some little matters to talk over with you."

The old gentleman was a little out of humor, and a little out of spirits, and was not at all in a mood for an unpleasant communication; but, however, he was destined to have one made to him that day either by one party or by another, and there is no opposing one's destiny.

"I suppose that Agnes has not told you," she continued, "that she wants to leave us."

"No!" said he, "nor do I think that she does—why should she?"

"Yes, indeed," repeated she, "why should she? but however she does. Her mother, she tells me, and her uncle in Scotland, wish it; but that may be an excuse, as very likely it is, if they are rational people; for where among them can she have a home like this? the same advantages, and the same class of society? However, she tells me that she wishes to go, and that immediately!"

"It is very odd, and very unkind not to have mentioned it to me!" said her uncle; "I thought that she was fond of me; and I take it as very unkind—very unkind, indeed! What am I to do without her?"

"Very true," said Mrs. Colville, "and so I told her; I told her that she was behaving very ill. We offered her a comfortable home here; she has been treated just like one of the family, and you have been like a father to her—I told her all this. I am not at all pleased with her, for I consider that she had no more right to go away in this abrupt manner than a hired servant had!"

"Do not talk of it in that way," replied Mr. Lawford, sharply; "Agnes was not anything like a servant here! She is her own mistress, and if she can be happier away from us, we have no right to prevent her going—but, however, that is not what I expected from her—and I'll tell you what, Mrs. Colville, there's a something at the bottom of all this; there's a reason for it," said he, raising himself in his chair, and speaking with that energy which indicated a coming storm: "there's a something, Mrs. Colville, which I do not yet penetrate—somebody has been behaving ill to her! You behaved very ill yourself to her, about that ball at Merley Park; and," he continued, with an oath, "if her leaving us is caused by anyone behaving ill to her, I shall not readily forgive him, let it be who it may, Mrs. Colville!"

"Do not put yourself into a passion," said she, "I can explain it all to you."

"I will not see a fatherless girl wronged," continued he, without regarding her words, "much less my brother's daughter, and that I can tell you. There's a reason, I say, for her going, Mrs. Colville, and I'll know the bottom of it—I'll have her in here to your face, and know the bottom of it!"

"Bless me!" exclaimed Mrs. Colville, with a suddenly flushed countenance, "am I to be spoken to in this way? What's Agnes to me? Do you imagine that I plot, and cabal, and get up intrigues against her? Is this the return that I am to have for all my anxiety, and care, and thought, night and day, for your family? It is not kind of you, brother," said Mrs. Colville, assuming the voice and manner of an injured person.

Poor Mr. Lawford looked bewildered and dumb-founded; he knew not precisely what to say and therefore was silent; and Mrs. Colville, making use of the advantage she had gained, continued, "You are right in imagining there is some motive for her conduct, and a powerful one, too, and I'll tell you what it is. I was convinced that there was a something myself, and I have watched her narrowly—poor thing! she has lost her heart to her cousin! I saw how her countenance changed when Mr. Latimer mentioned Tom's engagement to Miss Bolton; and when you said that you wished he had chosen her, she looked ready to faint!"

"Poor, dear girl!" sighed her kind-hearted uncle.

"It is very unfortunate for her," continued Mrs. Colville, "for I am convinced that she is greatly attached to him; and I do not blame her so much for that, for Tom has fine qualities—and however much I blamed her at first for leaving us, I can now see reason for it, and I think we must not oppose it. Tom, as I said, has fine qualities; I have thought him much improved of late, and I fancy that he is much staidier; but when he was about being married that was natural."

"Poor thing!" sighed Mr. Lawford; "but I tell you what, Mrs. Colville," said he, again seeming to be on the verge of a passion, "if I can find out that my son has been trifling with her affections, he need not look for my forgiveness!"

"There is no danger of that," interposed she; "Tom knows what he is about; he has been thinking of no one but Henrietta Bolton, I will answer for it; and it is a pity that Agnes thought anything about him!"

Mrs. Colville made it all appear very intelligible to her brother, and very easy to be accounted for; but how much she herself was convinced of the truth of it we know not.

The rain continued; and, later in the afternoon, as Mr. Lawford could not go out, Agnes sat with him, intending to take an opportunity of breaking the painful subject to him. How kind he seemed to her, poor old gentleman! His heart was filled with such intense compassion for her. He had said many a time, that if he were a young man he should fall in love with her—he now wished that he had another son to give her. The truest proof, however, of the reality of his affection for her, was his willingness to part with her, seeing that the happiness of her life or the peace of her mind made the leaving Lawford needful for her; but she must not leave me altogether, thought he, pondering on the subject even in her presence—she must come back again to me—we will hope it is not so serious but that she may come back again! He looked at her tenderly without speaking, and the tears rolled down his cheeks.

"What is amiss, dear uncle?" asked she, "what distresses you?"

"I've heard it," replied he; "your Aunt Colville has told me, and it has cut me up sadly; but we must not be unreasonable with you; we must consider your own feelings."

Agnes was taken by surprise; but still it was a relief to find that she was spared making the painful disclosure. Her uncle had resolved, with feelings of true delicacy, not to let her know that of which her aunt had informed him regarding the state of her affections; but his heart was so full that it was next to impossible to conceal it.

"I hoped," said he, looking tenderly in her face, "that we had made you happy amongst us."

"You have, dear uncle," said she, rising to his side, and laying her arm on his shoulder as he liked her to do, "and I shall never forget your affection for me. You have been like a second father, and parting from you is like a repetition of my first sorrow"—she could not restrain her feelings and wept bitterly—she seated herself on the low seat beside him, on which she sat to read to him. He wept with her; he laid his hand upon her head as her own father used to do, and drew it tenderly to his knee; and thus they both sat for a long time in silence.

"You have been a daughter to me, Agnes," at length he said, "a very daughter. I owe you many pleasant hours. Old man as I am, I have been benefited by your conversation, by your example! I have sometimes thought that, like Abraham, unawares I have entertained an angel. May God Almighty bless you, my child, and reward you better than I can? may He bless with fulfillment every desire of you heart! Tell me, my child, is there anything I can do for you?"

Agnes said nothing; she clasped her uncle's hand in hers, and pressed it tenderly to her lips; but she could at that moment make no reply.

At length the old man raised himself in his chair, wiped his eyes, gave a husky cough, and showed that he was about to shake off the grief that oppressed him.

"Now, my love," said he, "let us talk rationally together. Is there anything which your old uncle can do for you?"

She replied that there was nothing.

"Then you must do something for me," said he; "you must not leave immediately; Ada always is engaged; I shall miss you greatly. I cannot part with you all at once; can you not wait yet a month?"

Agnes replied that it was her wish to go sooner.

"Well, a week," said he, remembering that his son remained from home so long. I cannot part with you under a week! and promise me, moreover, that you will come again to me. I will not fix when; it shall be at your own time; when your own heart can bear it—or when you are disposed," added he, wishing to amend the expression; "but for me you cannot come too soon!"

The allusion which her uncle had twice made to the state of her own heart, troubled her; she feared that the true state of her feelings regarding Mr. Latimer was discovered—she blushed, and her uncle was all the more confirmed in his own belief.

"And even if you should never come back," said he, "write to me sometimes, and tell me about your brothers; the little fellow that has the Rutherford face, and Arthur. I wish we could have had them here! And then, when you marry let me know; and don't be in a hurry, Agnes, for there are few men who are worthy of you; but I should like to know, for I consider you as one of my own children; and if I can make you no better return, I can give you a dowry."

Again Agnes wept; she was questioning with herself whether after all she were justified in leaving him. "I will stay with you a week," said she, "and please God, when Ada is married to Mr. Latimer, and my cousin is married, then if he and his wife will have me for an inmate, I will come and be with you; for as to marrying myself, dearest uncle, I am not likely to do that."

"You shall come and live with me," said he, kissing her tenderly, and looking very much pleased. "I shall keep you to your word, spite of a whole clan of Scotsmen."

The rain, which had now continued for three or four days without much intermission, gave signs of clearing off, and the news that Miss Agnes Lawford was about to leave her uncle's circulated about till it reached the Hays.

The very morning after it reached Mr. Latimer, he rode over to Lawford. He had several reasons for going there just then; one of those we will state. His brother-in-law, Mr. Acton, was a great promoter of floriculture, especially among the people. The cottagers all round him were florists. One of the first things which he did three years before, when he purchased his little estate and began to lay out his grounds, before his house was built, was to establish in the neighborhood a floricultural society, from which prizes were to be given to the poor for their best flowers. Since he had resided in the neighborhood, his example had made the thing popular and fashionable also. The flower-shows were pleasant occasions of meeting, and the whole country round talked of them with interest and delight. It was now the time of auriculars and ranunculuses; and the little society was to hold its first meeting this season, in the lovely grounds belonging to Mr. Acton. The gentlemen of the neighborhood were to send green-house plants; a tent was to be erected in the grounds, as a sort of temple of Flora; and cards of invitation had been issued for above a fortnight. There was quite an excitement in that little country world about this occasion, which it was rumored was to be unusually splendid and interesting; and then came the rain and dashed everybody's hopes; the poor man's flowers, the rich people's show, and the whole country's pleasure! But in all cases there is a little cranny for hope to creep in at, and so it was now; people hoped that the weather would change with the change of the moon. The moon changed, and at that very time the most glorious weather began.

The Lawfords had all been invited to dine at the Actons', after the prizes were distributed; and now the ostensible motive of Mr. Latimer's visit had reference to this. The flower-show was in two days; he prophesied, of a certainty, fine weather, and he wished to engage the whole Lawford family to take luncheon at the Hays, as had been arranged on the unfortunate day of the proposed picnic. It was but a very little way out of their direct road, and his manner very clearly showed that he intended to have no refusal. Agnes had not seen him now for several days; the circumstance of the pine-apples being sent to Ada, trivial as it was, had satisfied her that her own imagination had given much greater importance to his attentions on the night of the rectory party, than there was any occasion for. She was going, she thought, so soon, that even the prospect of meeting Tom at the Actons'—for Mr. Latimer brought word that he was coming to London to be there—did not deter her from the wish to be this one of the party; yes, even if her own heart carried away with it a deeper anguish.

Mr. Latimer was in high spirits—very high. He spoke of Agnes' departure with surprise, but not at all with the air of one who was much interested in it. Ada thanked him for the pine-apples, and he was delighted that she was pleased with them. Agnes inquired after the poor invalid in the caravan; he said that she was better, and would certainly recover; that that extraordinary preacher whom he had described the other evening, was preaching in the neighboring villages with very remarkable effect; that he seemed wonderfully attached to the beautiful child at the caravan, and that he himself had met him out on his little preaching excursions, with the child in his arms. Marchmont, he said, extraordinary as it might seem, appeared really quite a reformed man. He had been told, he said, by his gardener, how much astonishment this change in him had occasioned in the neighborhood, and that he had been to Leicester and taken the Temperance Pledge. He intended, he said, himself to have some talk with the preacher when he next came to Merley, or wherever he might meet with him. He said that he should like Agnes to see that beautiful child; in fact, he should like them all to see it.

"It must be that little founding child of ours!" exclaimed Ada, suddenly struck with the idea; "that poor founding child Mrs. Marchmont adopted. I told you of it the other evening," said Ada; "we must see it—poor little thing!"

The day of the flower-show came; the loveliest day of the whole year. It was all the more beautiful for the rain, said every one; and yet the day before had been so warm and bright, that all moisture seemed gone from the surface of the earth, so that even the most delicate lady need not fear to soil her satin slipper.

After breakfast, when everyone was alive with the thoughts of the day's pleasure, old Mr. Lawford surprised them all by saying, that he had half a mind to go with them, at least as far as the Hays. Dear old man! he wanted to have as much as he could of Agnes' company during the short remainder of her stay; but he did not say so; he only said, that as the day was so fine, and the carriage so easy, and his gout so much better, and as he could have his air-cushions and gout-stool, he did not see that the fatigue would be much more than that of his bath-chair; certainly it would not!

Everybody was delighted; it would please Mr. Latimer so very much; if he were tired he might stop at the Hays, and they would call for him in the evening. So they might, said he; but he thought that he very likely should go on as far as Mr. Acton's; he had never seen his cottage since it was finished. He said nothing about shaking hands with his new daughter-in-law, although he thought of it; nor did Mrs. Colville—for, even she, on this morning so auspicious to everyone, seemed quite disposed to avoid giving pain—"And if," added the old gentleman, suddenly thinking that perhaps seeing his son under such circumstances would be painful to her, "I should take it into my head to stop at the Hays till you return, Agnes, if she like, can stop with me. The Hays is a fine place, and we can get into the garden, or sit in the library; it's a fine room, and Mr. Latimer has the largest collection of books, and the best selection too the neighborhood!"

A messenger rode over from the Hays with Mr. Latimer's compliments, and begged, as the morning was so fine, they would be with him as early as possible.

"Bless me! what can be the meaning of this!" exclaimed Mrs. Colville, startled out of her usual quietude.

The young ladies went up to dress; the carriage was ordered out; and dear old Mr. Lawford, quite talkative with his inopportune pleasure trip, took his seat with his gout-stool and his air-cushions, by the side of Mrs. Colville, who looked quite gracious. The space which Mr. Lawford required with his lame foot, caused there to be no room for Agnes. She therefore was obliged to go down to the rectory, that she might accompany Mr. and Mrs. Sam in their phaeton. Fortunately the rector and his lady were going to drive to Merley Park, to call on the Bridports, before they went to the Hays, and therefore the carriage was at the door, and they just setting out.

"I wonder what Latimer means by sending for you so much earlier," said Mr. Sam. "But it's lucky you came when you did, or in five minutes you would have been too late."

Mrs. Sam proposed that they should join her father's carriage, and drive at once to the Hays, that they might understand this mysterious hastening of the party; and thus it was decided.

Agnes had never been to the Hays; she had only seen its trees and its chimneys from a distance, and she saw them drive in through the old gray lodge gates into the park-like grounds that surrounded the house. Agnes' state of mind on this day was something like that of a drunkard, who, seeing a carouse has begun, determines, reckless of consequences, to make a night of it. This was the last time she should see Mr. Latimer; this was the first time she had been at his home. There was a little romance for her heart; and, if she indulged it, let no moralist blame her too severely.

And now they got glimpses of the old, red brick house, with its gray stone quoins and window-heads, and its stacks of handsome cross-banded chimneys, that gave character and dignity to the whole edifice. All was quiet and substantial, with an air of old, solid family-pride about it, that accorded with the long stretches of lawn scattered over with well-grown and almost venerable trees. And now the first carriage drew up at the door, and out came a grave servant to receive them. The sight of Mr. Lawford, however, brought out Mr. Latimer himself, who, delighted and astonished to see the old gentleman, gave him such a cordial welcome as did his heart good. And what a warm welcome they all had!

Everybody wondered why they were come a full hour earlier than had at first been named; and they were destined to wonder even more, for, scarcely were they seated in the handsome morning room, when Mr. Latimer, taking Agnes' hand, with a most peculiar expression of countenance, said, "Permit me!" and then led her out of the room.

"What is the meaning of this?" said everyone who remained.

"Permit me?" again said Mr. Latimer to Agnes, who, astonished and almost terrified, looked at him with wondering eyes. But nothing more was needed—the library door burst open, and two boys at once caught Agnes in their arms.

"Here we are!" exclaimed they, "aren't you surprised? You never thought to find us here!"

Poor Agnes! nor did she indeed; and with these exclamations they drew their astonished sister with them into the library, and shut the door.

Mr. Latimer explained to his guests his extraordinary conduct; he wished, he said, to give Miss Agnes Lawford a pleasure. He had perceived her great affection for her brothers; the poor boys had nowhere to go in the holidays; he knew the gentleman with whom they were; and not fearing to obtain consent from everyone, he ventured, as the time was short, to write at once for them—and their being here would prevent Miss Agnes leaving Lawford so soon.

Poor old Mr. Lawford was quite affected, he wiped his eyes, and, offering his hand to Mr. Latimer, shook his cordially—"This was worth coming out to hear! and you have done me a great pleasure!" said he.

Mr. Latimer smiled on the kind-hearted old gentleman, and told him farther, that his son, Mr. Tom Lawford, who was returning from London for this flower-show, had promised to take charge of them; in fact, he said, Tom had had the boys with him two or three days in London, and they had almost turned one another's heads.

"How charming," said Ada, "and how much it will please Agnes, and how very thoughtful it was of you!" Again old Mr. Lawford was seen to wipe his eyes. "Thank you, Mr. Latimer," again said he; and, taking up the former idea, added, "and I don't think that now she will leave us so soon. It is a pity she is going at all, is it not?"

But he received no answer, for Mrs. Colville inquired, at the same moment, whether they seemed nice boys, these brothers of Agnes.

"How poorly you are looking, Agnes dear!" said Harry, with his arm on her shoulder, as they all three sat together on a sofa in the library. "I thought that you would be looking quite rosy with living in the country," said he, as if a little disappointed with her appearance.

"There, now, tears are in her eyes again!" exclaimed Arthur: "I never saw such a girl in all my life; when I'm glad I never cry!"

"I know you don't," said Agnes, again smiling, and clasping them both to her heart; "but this is so unlooked-for, so very kind, I really know not what to say—to me it seems more like a dream!" Again she embraced them. She made them stand up before her, and go to a distance; she looked at them behind and before; she laid her hand on their heads to see if they were grown; she saw how well they looked, how happy; she saw the resemblance in them to her father and her mother; and she thanked God, with a full heart, that they were her brothers, and that thus they met!

"Do you know," said Harry, with glowing cheeks, "that Mr. Latimer has all papa's works—the very best edition, all beautifully bound? Come, I'll show you them."

"Never mind books now!" said Arthur. "Let's have your bonnet off! There's a sweet sister! Now you look better," said he. "Oh, Harry, she's a very pretty girl, for all you said just now!"

Harry wanted to justify himself, but Arthur was impatient to hear about the people at Lawford.—"And don't you think Mr. Tom Lawford is a nice fellow, and Mr. Latimer?"

"And who do you think we saw last night?" exclaimed Arthur, leaving his sister no chance of talking herself. "Why, we saw Mr. Jeffkins—positively and truly Mr. Jeffkins, and nobody else?"

"He was so astonished to see us," said Harry, taking advantage of a little pause which his brother had made. "There's a little sort of common just by, and a sort of ladder-stile, which leads over the park fence to it; we just mounted up to look over, and what should we see but poor Mr. Jeffkins, sitting among the heath, reading his Bible. He was so astonished, he looked as if he could hardly believe his eyes. He asked a deal about you, and we told him you were coming here in the morning, and you did not know that we were here, and you were going to be so surprised!"

"And did you tell him?" asked Agnes anxiously. "that you had been in town with Mr. Tom Lawford?"

"Yes, we did," returned Harry, "we told him all about it, and everything."

"And what did he say?" inquired she.

"Oh, I don't know—nothing particular."

"Now, don't let us sit here all day," said Arthur; "this middle window opens—I know all over the garden."

"And it is such a lovely garden," said Harry, "and there are such flowers!"

"First of all," said Agnes, "I must take you to my uncle and my cousin Ada; and with a brother on each arm, and a countenance beaming with love and happiness, she presented them to her relations."

Everyone sympathized with her. Ada was charmed with the boys, and so was her father; and Mrs. Colville remarked that Arthur was certainly both handsome and gentlemanly, and that Harry was a complete Butherford.

Mr. Latimer's eyes followed Agnes wherever she went; and a much less interested observer than either Ada or her aunt would have seen at a glance that he was a deeply enamored lover. Some little consciousness of his marked attention very soon forced itself upon her; and then Ada's quiet manner and thoughtful countenance fixed it deeper on her mind.

"I am doomed unwittingly and unwillingly to be a trouble to them all," thought she, "and what atonement am I ever to make to Ada, if this really be so?" She determined through the rest of the day to avoid him; to remain with her brothers, to occupy herself with them, and to make of them her shield and defense. She was now angry with herself for having permitted her heart to indulge in one transient fancy. "Every weakness, every error," said she to herself, "brings its own reward of sorrow, and of repentance!"

In the meantime, Mr. Latimer was neither negligent nor indifferent towards Ada; nothing could be more courteous or even friendly, than his behavior to her; but she saw plainly, as she had seen before, that she had no longer empire in his heart. The very circumstance for which the whole party was brought there an hour earlier was to give Agnes pleasure. It was to Ada the complete bursting of the golden bubble; the fata morgana of love had all vanished, and the cold and hard reality of life lay like a barren desert before her!

The kindness which Tom Lawford had shown to her brothers, made it now no longer difficult for Agnes to meet him. What a wonderful virtue there is in kindness. She did not even express a wish to stay at the Hays, although her uncle preferred doing so. He was afraid, he said, of the ten miles farther; so he was carefully cushioned in an easy chair in the library and left to take his nap and amuse himself till dinner, when Mr. Latimer promised him that his old acquaintance, the Vicar of Merley, should come and dine with him, promising that on their way to the Actons' he would call at the vicarage, to make this arrangement for him. Agnes and her brothers, who were not to be divided, were to be driven in Mr. Latimer's carriage, and Mr. Latimer himself was to accompany Ada and her aunt. The arrangement at last seemed good and satisfactory.

A great deal of company had already arrived at the cottage; nothing could look gay, or more beautiful than the grounds; and the cavalry band, which was a very good one, played at intervals. It was quite a fairy-land scene. The grounds at the cottage were extensive, and laid out in the finest taste; there was wood and water within their boundary, and ample space for rambling and solitude here and there, fit for any love-scene whatever.

With her brothers at her side, Agnes felt not the slightest embarrassment in meeting her cousin; the most friendly understanding seemed to exist between them. She thanked him for all the kindness he had shown to her brothers; he praised her brothers as the most interesting and intelligent lads he had ever seen. In the course of the afternoon, however, Tom took an opportunity of sending the boys to row a little boat across the lake, and then asked Agnes to walk with him to see them. It was the quietest and most secluded walk in the whole demesne which Tom took her, and she leaned on his arm quite familiarly. At length Agnes ventured to express to him the pleasure his proposed alliance with Miss Bolton gave her—the subject was a delicate one, but still she ventured to touch it.

"I dare say," said he, "it seems to you a strangely hurried affair; and so it is—but it is all right. The only fault is, that Henrietta is too good for me; and so were you, dear Agnes," said he. "God knows how I want still to have a deal of talk with you. They tell me you are going—I am sorry for it; if, however, it is on my account, I promise you in no way to displease or annoy you. You are very dear to me, Agnes—and your visit in our family has had a strange influence on me; but I think I told you that before. But however, Agnes, go where you may, I shall always be your friend; and if I am ever worthy of Henrietta it is owing to you—I have told her so already—and my prayer is, that you may meet with a husband more worthy of you than I am, and who may love you as well as I should have done!"

"Do not let us talk so, dear cousin," said Agnes, "but we will always be friends."

"That we will," said Tom, emphatically. "And there is a foolish little thing, which I must mention to you," said he. "I gave you those jet ornaments—I had been foolish enough to make you wearing them or not; an omen for my heart, on that evening of my sister's party. I was very disagreeable that night to you. I was disappointed and annoyed; but, however, that is past. And now will you accept those ornaments from me, as an atonement? I wish that they were worthier."

"If it were only a rosebud," said Agnes, quite touched by his conduct, "I would treasure it for your sake!"

"Here, then," said Tom, "the subject ends forever between us."

"It does," returned Agnes, "but we are friends forever."

Ada and Mr. Latimer walked arm in arm up and down the long shadowy pleached walk that ran the whole length of the garden. People saw them and avoided the walk, for all the world believed them to be lovers. But their conversation, whatever it might be, only left Ada graver and more thoughtful; the true feelings of her heart, however, were concealed under her coldest and proudest demeanor. She received everywhere the homage of her beauty, and George Bridport, who would only have been too happy to have carried her lap-dog, was ten times over her slave. The world said, however, that Ada Lawford was not in her most amiable humor that day. If it had said that a blight had fallen on her youth and her life that day, it would have been much truer.

"What two handsome boys these are!" exclaimed many a one as they saw Arthur and Harry, with their bright and joyous countenances, which bore in their characteristic difference of expression, a resemblance to morning and evening.

"These are Mr. Frank Lawford's sons," said one to another, among the company, "and that young lady in mourning, is his daughter."

"How interesting looking they are!" was the reply; and for the sake of Mr. Frank Lawford, with his world-wide reputation, people wished to notice them; and many a poor man, too poor to buy his works, but who had known them well by newspaper extracts, or by some stray well-worn volume, which had fallen into their hands, and thenceforth became a text-book to their little circle, looked after them with a sentiment, more akin to reverence, than if they had been the queen's own offspring.

In the evening, when the company was all gone, and dinner was over, and coffee had been sipped, and people had chatted, and talked over all the affairs of the day, Mrs. Colville who, she hardly knew why, was not quite satisfied with several things, began to be impatient to return. The boys, however, were out; and Tom, who was to return with them to the Hall, was not to be found; and then, when they were found, it was discovered that Agnes and Mr. Latimer were missing.

It was just like collecting a stray flock of sheep.

"You see how reluctant our friends are to leave us," said Mrs. Acton, smiling. "I wish you would follow their example."

But Mrs. Colville could neither smile nor follow their example; besides which, and that was very unpleasant to her, Mrs. Acton seemed so provokingly indifferent about having her brother and Agnes sought after. They could not be far off, she said; they would soon be making their appearance, and it really was very early.

At length Harry, to whom Mrs. Colville appealed, said that he had seen them down by the water-side, just when he and his brother were bringing up the boat to the shore—that was half a mile off, he said, and he should not wonder if they were there still.

It was proposed to send Harry to seek him; and then, just at that very moment, in walked Agnes and Mr. Latimer following her. Everybody's eyes were upon them. It looked very suspicious, but no one said anything; the carriages were waiting.

Tom rode on horseback; and the party returned to the Hays according to the arrangement of the morning. Before they drove off from the cottage, Ada heard Mrs. Acton beg of Agnes to come and spend some time with her before she left the country; she would have, she said, her brothers there, and she was sure that they could make the time pass very pleasantly. Whatever Agnes' answer might be, Ada did not hear it. Mr. Latimer with great courtesy begged to hand her to the carriage, and Agnes was left to Mr. and Mrs. Acton, who seemed overflowing with kindness to her. It seemed almost as if Agnes had supplanted her with these old friends.

The boys talked all the way they went; nothing could equal the flow of their spirits. It was well for Agnes that they were all-sufficient for themselves, for she had more to think of that evening than she had ever had to think of before.

Mr. Latimer had asked her to go and see an evening primrose of remarkable beauty; and then perhaps forgetting the flower altogether, he had led her on and on into the far shrubbery, where, without preamble of any kind, he had made such a straight-forward, candid, and manly declaration of love as left the question for whom were his attentions no longer in doubt.

Oh, if Agnes could only have acted from the impulses of her own heart how easy would have been the answer; but a sense of honor, and of delicacy towards her cousin, made the answer which her heart dictated impossible.

She hesitated; she would not speak a falsehood; she dared not speak the truth. She felt exactly as Mrs. Colville had always done, that Mr. Latimer was not a man to be trifled with; but how was she to explain even her hesitation without betraying her cousin?

"I was told," at length she said, "even before I came to Lawford, that you were engaged to my Cousin Ada; and, to speak the truth, I have always regarded you as destined for her."

"There was a time," replied Mr. Latimer, "I will not deny it, when my heart pleaded very warmly for Ada; but in her I found not all that I required in a wife. Two years' absence from England confirmed still more my earlier opinions regarding women. I returned cured of my passion, which, for some time before I left, I had sufficient reason to consider hopeless. I returned sobered in many respects, and two years' older in feeling. The very day after my return I met you; you were the realization of all my hopes and requirements; since that moment my mind has never wavered, nor doubted the wisdom of its choice. I know my own character, Agnes, and I believe also that I know something of yours—enough, at least, to convince me that we are in all respects suited to each other; we have tastes and feelings in common, the same views in life. Where then is the cause for demur or doubt?"

"It is," said Agnes, "like pleading against my own happiness; almost like ingratitude to Heaven to oppose what you say. But do not require from me at this moment a definite answer; I was not prepared for this. I feel that much is to be considered—weighed. There are many consequences which I can foresee, and which I dread. I feel as if this were a happiness not meant for me, and which I have no right to."

"Enough, enough!" said Latimer, well pleased by what she had said; "for I know after this, and of a certainty, that you will be my own dear Agnes; permit me only to speak to your uncle."

In the hands of Mr. Latimer it seemed to Agnes as if it would be hurried on too fast.

"No, no," said she, peremptorily, "my answer is not an assent. You not what you are about—much, very much is yet to be thought of. I cannot tell what my uncle would say—I know not even what he ought to do regarding it. No one, not even myself, has been prepared for this."

Such an interview as this might well make both Agnes and Mr. Latimer silent in their respective carriages on their drive back to the Hays.

"How remarkably silent—almost stupid Mr. Latimer is to-night," whispered Mrs. Colville to Ada, as they sat in the carriage at the door of the Hays, waiting for Mr. Lawford, who was now to join them. Mr. Latimer brought out the old gentleman, who seemed amazingly merry; the old vicar was with him, and they seemed quite reluctant to part. He was assisted into the carriage; his gait-stool and his air-cushions were settled to his mind.

Mr. and Mrs. Sam Colville had driven home immediately after dinner, and now Agnes had to return home in the rumble behind the carriage. The boys found it very amusing to help her up to her seat; Mr. Latimer offered her his hand at parting—the very touch thrilled her to the heart.

"Good-night! good-night!" rang from the lips of the merry-hearted boys. "We shall come up to Lawford to-morrow!"

"Do; there are good fellows!" returned Mr. Lawford, and the carriage drove away.

CHAPTER XX.

THE day was ended; an important day to three of our party. Every one, even Mr. Lawford, seemed tired, and all immediately retired for the night.

Ada exchanged not a word with her cousin; but, as Agnes sat in her chamber a full hour after midnight yet dressed, pondering with an anxious and deeply foreboding mind on the decided turn which events had taken, again the door opened which divided her bedroom from her cousin's, and Ada, pale as marble, and looking almost as rigid, stood in the doorway, and said in a sad and solemn voice, "Come into this room; I have something to say to you!"

With somewhat the feeling of a criminal, and yet with a heart ready almost to give up life for her sake, Agnes obeyed; and, as she had done on a former occasion, seated herself on the sofa beside her.

"I have much to say to you," said Ada; "much which concerns your peace and mine, and the sooner it is said the better. You have proved yourself worthy of my confidence; you never betrayed my former confession even to Mr. Latimer. I thank you! you have not caused me to lose my own self-respect. A weak character, with your generous feelings, thinking to have served me with Mr. Latimer, would have betrayed me to him. How much I thank you for not having done so! Had Mr. Latimer's heart inclined to me, even in the smallest degree, no confession of any kind would have been needed; as it did not, such a confession must only have been humiliating to me. The time when he could become attached to me, has long been passed; I cherished false hopes, and like every other false thing they punished their possessor. I must bear the punishment because I doubt not my former folly deserved it. For you a better lot is in store, because you have deserved it. Do not interrupt me, Agnes," said she, seeing her cousin about to speak. "I am in no humor, I assure you, for bandying about compliments; and I say nothing but the barest truth to-night. Let me speak, and do not interrupt me, for I have as much upon my heart as it will bear!"

"I have for some time suspected," continued she, "that I had no longer any hold upon Mr. Latimer's heart; but that which we hold dear as life, we part with reluctantly. To-day has set the question at rest. Mr. Latimer has declared his love to you; do not deny it!"

"I do not deny it!" said Agnes.

"And you love him; neither can you deny that!" Both remained silent; anguish oppressed the hearts of both; but for the one there was hope, for the other none; and yet at that moment, it would have been hard to say which suffered the most.

"I could almost wish," said Agnes, at length, "that I had never come to Lawford; I have been like a dark cloud between you and your happiness. I feel as if it were almost an insult to say even that I love you, and yet I would give up all for you!"

"You must love me still," said Ada; "deprived of your affection I should be very forlorn. You must love me still! you must not desert me, for my heart has suffered shipwreck! But I am not going to make a spectacle of myself," said she, speaking in her natural tone; "I want no one's pity. You have proved to me how well you deserve my confidence, and therefore I place still more, still greater confidence in you. Do not regret that you came amongst us. I have found in you the realization of that high principle, and that single-hearted goodness which your father's works teach, and I have learned more from you even than from them."

These words seemed to humble Agnes; she felt as if she must sink down at Ada's feet; but, feeling that words and actions at that time expressed so little, she answered her only by silence, which is often so expressive.

"I have gone through a great deal," continued Ada, "as you may believe; a great deal in a very short time. This day—what has it not revealed to me, what has it not taught me! And Agnes, in the same way as my heart feels warmly, my mind decides rapidly. My plans are all formed; the line of conduct which I must pursue is already marked out, and I have already entered upon it. Late as it was, I had just returned from an interview with my father when I came to you."

"With your father," repeated Agnes, both amazed and alarmed.

"I told him," continued Ada, "what I had discovered of Mr. Latimer's sentiments towards you; and I have won from him his entire approbation."

The generosity of this conduct, knowing what self-sacrifice it involved, overpowered Agnes. She covered her face with her hands, and wept; inwardly beseeching God to bless, and strengthen, and comfort one who had acted so unselfishly, so nobly.

"Ah, Ada!" said Agnes, "how much more noble, how much more admirable are you than I! and yet, I will not deny it," said she, "I, too, was capable of making a sacrifice for you. Let me confess also, I wished to leave Lawford that I might not interfere with your happiness. I now feel poor, in that I can do nothing for you."

"You can do much for me!" returned Ada. "A time will come when I, perhaps, may not be as strong as I now am; a time when I may say, even as Christ did, let this cup pass from me! then, be you, the angel that will stand by me and strengthen me!"

Agnes folded her cousin in her arms, and wept on her bosom.

"I have formed plans, as I told you," continued Ada, "which will require strength to carry out. I shall go to India to my brother; he loves me tenderly; we shall be dear to each other as husband and wife. The preparations for this long journey, a journey which has many attractions for me, and which, under happier circumstances, would be very seductive to my imagination, will be very useful to me—will take me out of myself—will, in fact, be my salvation. I shall now, from this time, look to India as to my home, and center the true love of my heart upon my brother. I will have no one's pity, Agnes—the world is to know nothing but that it is my pleasure or my whim to go abroad. I will see you married before I leave, and I myself will be your bridesmaid. And now, one thing more, and I have done—keep in the innermost recesses of your heart the knowledge of that which I did for Mr. Latimer's sake. It is enough that the benefit of that discipline of mind, the blessing of your father's teaching, through his works, will be my reward, and will support me, by the blessing of God, through every trial and every sorrow! And now, good-night!"

"I shall not leave you," said Agnes, "until I have seen your head upon your pillow."

Ada consented. Agnes smoothed for her the pillow, and laid her throbbing temples upon it; and then, drawing the curtains, sat down beside her till she slept.

It was a feverish and disturbed sleep, and was the precursor of a long and sad sickness. We, however, will not dwell upon it. The most untiring love and devotion watched by her and tended her; and youth, and youth's strength, bore her through it.

Three months afterwards, in the month of September, she sat, for the first time, once more in the little library at tea with her father. Poor old gentleman! how glad he was to see her again beside him! Neither he nor the world knew exactly what was the cause of her great illness. Many people supposed that she had taken cold at the flower-show. Mrs. Colville strenuously supported this idea; Ada, she said, was delicate, the ground was damp after the great rains that there had been, and that dear Ada's illness was no more than she expected. Some people have such certain foreknowledge of everything!

It was not known, beyond the immediate members of the Lawford and Latimer families, for some months, that Mr. Latimer was the betrothed lover of the niece instead of the daughter of the old squire. People were very much astonished when this knowledge first began to circulate amongst them; but it was singular how very soon everybody was satisfied that it was quite in the proper order of things; and this was only the more strengthened, because the whole family, and even Ada herself, seemed well pleased. But greater still was their astonishment, when the news went abroad that Ada was going out to India, although not until after the two marriages, that of her brother Tom and of her cousin Agnes, were celebrated.

And what said Mrs. Colville and her coadjutor, Mrs. Sam, all this time? They said enough for everybody else, had they all been silent; but then they had sense enough to express very little dissatisfaction to the world, seeing that they whom it most concerned had settled all so resolutely before they were consulted.

"When my sweet Ada is gone," Mrs. Colville, however, said to her acquaintance, "and my nephew has brought home his new wife, I shall leave the Hall. I do not know what will become of my poor brother when I am gone," said she; "but, new men, new measures; and my brother is not what he used to be. Poor man! he has taken strange crotchets into his head. He talks of sending for that preaching fellow, Jeffkins to the Hall—I hope, by the bye, that he is no relation to that creature who lived with Mrs. Sam! and he has actually had that child there that Mrs. Marchmont took out of the work-house, and has been sending Mrs. Marchmont jellies and such things! Poor man! his mind is certainly sadly impaired; it is my opinion that he hardly knows what he does; however, I leave all that—for there will be a change, I know, when the mistress comes!"

"And then, at the Hays, what a change, to be sure! and, between you and me, I do not think Mr. Latimer at all improved by his two years' absence from England; he has been in the West Indies among the slaves, and in America among the democrats, and he has brought home some extraordinary notions; and he is, with all his great abilities, a dogged, determined man, whom there is no turning. I have very much altered my opinion about Mr. Latimer! However, that is neither here nor there; and I am told that new furniture is ordered for the drawing-room. He has had a London upholsterer and decorator down, and is laying out a deal of money; and yet he gets not a penny with his wife! Poor Ada's picture, that she leaves Agnes as her parting present, is to hang there. They have all been and chosen the place. It seemed to me—God knows why!—as if they were going to choose the place where she was to be buried! A beautiful picture she makes! We have had Pickersgill down for a whole month; he paints one for her father, too; and I must have a handsome miniature. A beautiful creature she is, only a little paler than she was; and so cheerful—it's quite wonderful! But she's a real angel; and it is a pity that she must leave old England!"

"And then I hear, too, that Mr. Frank Lawford's widow is to come out of Scotland to see her daughter married. Bless me! who would have thought of Frank's daughter being Mrs. Latimer of the Hays?"

FIRESIDE LIBRARY

Of Notable Works by Notable Authors. Beautifully printed in the popular folio form; each issue a complete novel and sold at the uniform price of TEN CENTS. No double price on double or extra size numbers.

- | | | |
|--|---|---|
| 1 W. SHE HIS WIFE? Mrs. Mary R. Crowell 10c | 50 LOVE IN A MAZE. By Mrs. E. F. Ellet. 10c | 84 PEARL OF PEARLS. By A. P. Morris, Jr. 10c |
| 2 FLYING FROM LOVE. By Harriet Irving. 10c | 51 CATHOLINA. By Dr. J. H. Robinson. 10c | 85 FOR HONOR'S SAKE. By Mary Reed Crowell. 10c |
| 3 DID HE LOVE HER? Bartley T. Campbell. 10c | 52 A ROMANCE OF A POOR YOUNG GIRL. Ellet. 10c | 86 LANCE URQUHART'S LOVE. Annie Thomas. 10c |
| 4 A STRANGE WOMAN. By Rett Winwood. 10c | 53 THE LOCKED HEART. By Corinne Cushman. 10c | 87 SAFELY MARRIED. By author of "Caste." 10c |
| 5 TWO GIRLS' LIVES. By Mrs. M. R. Crowell. 10c | 54 THE PRIDE OF THE DOWNES. By M. Blount. 10c | 88 FLORETTE. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham. 10c |
| 6 THE WAR OF HEARTS. Corinne Cushman. 10c | 55 A STRANGE GIRL. By Albert W. Alken. 10c | 89 THREE TIMES DEAD. By Miss M. E. Braddon. 10c |
| 7 THE FALSE WIDOW. Mrs. J. D. Burton. 10c | 56 THE PRETTY PURITAN. By A. Parson's Daughter. 10c | 90 FOR A WOMAN'S SAKE. By Watts Phillips. 10c |
| 8 LOST FOR LOVE. Miss M. E. Braddon. 10c | 57 DID SHE SIN? By Mary Reed Crowell. 10c | 91 'HE COMETH NOT,' SHE SAID. By Thomas. 10c |
| 9 TOILERS OF THE SEA. By Victor Hugo. 10c | 58 DOUBLY DIVORCED. By Jenny Davis Burton. 10c | 92 THE NEW MAGDALEN. By Wilkie Collins. 10c |
| 10 THE QUADROON. By Catharine A. Warfield. 10c | 59 A WICKED WOMAN. By Lillie D. U. Blake. 10c | 93 AN OPEN VERDICT. By Miss M. E. Braddon. 10c |
| 11-18 UNCLE SILAS. By J. S. Le Fanu. 10c | 60 BLIND BARBARA'S SECRET. Mary Halpine. 10c | 94 SWORD AND GOWN. By Geo. A. Lawrence. 10c |
| 19-20 DEAD-SEA FRUIT. Miss M. E. Braddon. 10c | 61 AN AMERICAN QUEEN. By Grace Mortimer. 10c | 95 A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK. By James Payne. 10c |
| 21-22 LITTLE KATE KIRBY. F. W. Robinson. 10c | 62 MARGOT, THE STRANGE. By W. M. Turner. 10c | 96 HER FACE WAS HER FORTUNE. By Robinson. 10c |
| 23 SOWING THE WIND. Mrs. Mary R. Crowell. 10c | 63 WIFE OR WIDOW. By Rett Winwood. 10c | 97 JANE EYRE. By Charlotte Bronte. 10c |
| 24-25 BIRDS OF PREY. Miss M. E. Braddon. 10c | 64 THE CREOLE COUSINS. By Philip S. Warner. 10c | 98 WRECKED IN PORT. By Edmund Yates. 10c |
| 26 THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S. Charles Lever. 10c | 65 PURSUED TO THE ALTAR. By Cushman. 10c | 99 THE COLLEEN BAWN. By Gerald Griffin. 10c |
| 27-28 CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE. By Braddon. 10c | 66 THE TERRIBLE TRUTH. By Jennie D. Burton. 10c | 100 AN AMBITIOUS GIRL; or, She Would Be an Actress. By A. Celebrated Actress. 10c |
| 29 A GIRL'S HEART. By Rett Winwood. 10c | 67 ELEGANT EGBERT. By Philip S. Warner. 10c | 101 FOUL PLAY. By Charles Reade and Dion Boucicault. 10c |
| 30-31 RED AS A ROSE IN SHE. Rhoda Broughton. 10c | 68 LADY HELEN'S VOW. By Mrs. E. F. Ellet. 10c | 102 CARITA. By Mrs. Oliphant. 10c |
| 32 THE LILY OF ST. ERNE. By Mrs. Crow. 10c | 69 BOWIE, THE KNIGHT OF CHIVALRY. Warner. 10c | 103 A WOMAN HATER. By Charles Reade. 10c |
| 33 STRANGELY WED. By Mrs. J. D. Burton. 10c | 70 DRIFTING TO RUIN. By Mary Reed Crowell. 10c | 104 AFTER DARK. By Wilkie Collins. 10c |
| 34 THE GIPSY BRIDE. By M. E. O. Malen. 10c | 71 THE PARSON'S DAUGHTER. By A. Parson's Daughter. 10c | 105 HARD TIMES. By Charles Dickens. 10c |
| 35 ANNIE TEMPLE. By Rev. J. H. Ingraham. 10c | 72 THE MYSTERIOUS GUARDIAN. By Cushman. 10c | 106 GRIP. By B. L. Farjeon. August 4th. 10c |
| 36 WITHOUT MERCY. By Bartley T. Campbell. 10c | 73 WAS SHE A WIFE. By Rett Winwood. 10c | 107 FENTON'S QUEST. By Braddon. Aug. 11th. 10c |
| 37 BLACK EYES AND BLUE. Corinne Cushman. 10c | 74 ADRIA, THE ADOPTED. By Jennie D. Burton. 10c | 108 THREE FEATHERS. By W. Black. Aug. 18. 10c |
| 38 A DANGEROUS WOMAN. Margaret Blount. 10c | 75 PRETTY AND PROUD. By Corinne Cushman. 10c | 109 JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN. By Miss Mulock. Ready Aug 26th. 10c |
| 39 OUIDA'S LOVE. By Henrietta E. De Conde. 10c | 76 THE BITTER FEUD. By Jennie D. Burton. 10c | 110 MURPHY'S MASTER. By J. Payn. Sept. 1st. 10c |
| 40 LOST: A WIFE. By Corinne Cushman. 10c | 77 A WOMAN'S WORK. By Mrs. E. F. Ellet. 10c | |
| 41 WINNING WAYS. By Margaret Blount. 10c | 78 THE BLACK RIDDLE. By Corinne Cushman. 10c | |
| 42 A WOMAN'S HEART. By Mrs. M. V. Victor. 10c | 79 CORAL AND RUBY. By Jennie Davis Burton. 10c | |
| 43 THE DEAD LETTER. By Seeley Regester. 10c | 80 DIVORCED BUT NOT DIVIDED. By A. Parson's Daughter. 10c | |
| 44 LORD LILIE'S DAUGHTER. By C. M. Braeme. 10c | 81 ALMOST MARRIED. By A. Parson's Daughter. 10c | |
| 45 A WOMAN'S HAND. By author 'Dead Letter.' 10c | 82 TWO FAIR WOMEN. By Wm. M. Turner. 10c | |
| 46 VIALS OF WRATH. By Mrs. Mary R. Crowell. 10c | 83 THE INHERITANCE OF HATE. By Burton. 10c | |
| 47 A WILD GIRL. By Corinne Cushman. 10c | | |
| 48 THE MADDEST MARRIAGE EVER WAS. Burton. 10c | | |

A new issue every week.

For sale by all newsdealers, or sent, postage paid, on receipt of twelve cents. BEADLE AND ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William street, N. Y.

Waverley Library

The Only Young Ladies' Library of First-Class Copyright Novels Published. Price, Five Cents.

- | | | |
|---|---|--|
| 1 The Masked Bride; or, WILL SHE MARRY HIM? By Mrs. Mary Reed Crowell. | 33 The Three Sisters. By Alice Fleming. | 69 Camille; or, THE FAITH OF A COQUETTE. By Alex. Dumas. |
| 2 Was It Love? or, COLLEGIANS AND SWEET-HEARTS. By Wm. Mason Turner, M. D. | 34 A Marriage of Convenience; or, WAS HE A COUNT? By Sara Claxton. | 70 The Two Orphans. By D'Ennery. |
| 3 The Girl Wife. By Bartley T. Campbell. | 35 Sinned Against. By Clara Augusta. | 71 My Young Wife. By My Young Wife's Husband. |
| 4 A Brave Heart. By Arabella Southworth. | 36 Sir Archer's Bride. By A. Southworth. | 72 The Two Widows. By Annie Thomas. |
| 5 Bessie Haynor, the Work Girl. By Wm. Mason Turner, M. D. | 37 The Country Cousin. Rose Kennedy. | 73 Rose Michel; or, THE TRIALS OF A FACTORY GIRL. By Maude Hilton. |
| 6 The Secret Marriage. By Sara Claxton. | 38 His Own Again. Arabella Southworth. | 74 Cecil Castlemaine's Gage. By Ouida. |
| 7 A Daughter of Eve; or, BLINDED BY LOVE. By Mrs. Mary Reed Crowell. | 39 Filtration. By Ralph Royal. | 75 The Black Lady of Duna. By J. S. Le Fanu. |
| 8 Heart to Heart; or, FAIR PHYLLIS' LOVE. By Arabella Southworth. | 40 Pledged to Marry. By Sara Claxton. | 76 Charlotte Temple. By Mrs. Rowson. |
| 9 Alone in the World; or, THE YOUNG MAN'S WARD. By the author of "Clifton." | 41 Blind Devotion. By Alice Fleming. | 77 Christian Oakley's Mistake. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." |
| 10 A Pair of Gray Eyes; or, THE EMERALD NECKLACE. By Rose Kennedy. | 42 Beatrice, the Beautiful; or, HIS SECOND LOVE. By A. Southworth. | 78 My Young Husband. By Myself. |
| 11 Entangled. By Henrietta Thackeray. | 43 The Baronet's Secret. Sara Claxton. | 79 A Queen Amongst Women. By the author of "Dora Thorne." |
| 12 His Lawful Wife; or, MYRA, THE CHILD OF ADOPTION. By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. | 44 The Only Daughter; or, BROTHER AGAINST LOVER. By Alice Fleming. | 80 Her Lord and Master. By Florence Marryat. |
| 13 Madcap, the Little Quakeress. By Corinne Cushman. | 45 Her Hidden Poe. Arabella Southworth. | 81 Lucy Temple. |
| 14 Why I Married Him; or, THE WOMAN IN GRAY. By Sara Claxton. | 46 The Little Heiress. By M. A. Denison. | 82 A Long Time Ago. By Meta Orred. |
| 15 A Fair Face; or, OCT IN THE WORLD. By Bartley T. Campbell. | 47 Because She Loved Him; or, HOW WILL IT END. By Alice Fleming. | 83 Playing for High Stakes. By Annie Thomas. |
| 16 Trust Her Not; or, THE TRUE KNIGHT. By Margaret Leicester. | 48 In Spite of Himself. By S. R. Sherwood. | 84 The Laurel Bush. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." |
| 17 A Loyal Lover. By A. Southworth. | 49 His Heart's Mistress; or, LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT. By Arabella Southworth. | 85 Led Astray. By Octave Feuillet. |
| 18 His Idol; or, THE ILL-STARRED MARRIAGE. By Mrs. Mary Reed Crowell. | 50 The Cuban Heiress; or, THE PRISONER OF LA VENTURE. By Mrs. Mary A. Denison. | 86 Janet's Repentance. By George Eliot. |
| 19 The Broken Betrothal; or, LOVE VERSUS HATE. By Mary Grace Halpine. | 51 Two Young Girls; or, THE BRIDE OF AN EARL. By Alice Fleming. | 87 Romance of a Poor Young Man. By Octave Feuillet. |
| 20 Orphan Nell, the Orange Girl; or, THE WITCHES OF NEW YORK. Aggie Penn. | 52 The Winged Messenger; or, RISKING ALL FOR A HEART. By Mary Reed Crowell. | 88 A Terrible Deed; or, AIL FOR GOLD. By Emma Garrison Jones. |
| 21 Now and Forever; or, WHY DID SHE MARRY HIM? By Henrietta Thackeray. | 53 Agnes Hope, the Actress; or, THE ROMANCE OF A RUBY RING. W. M. Turner, M. D. | 89 A Gilded Sin. Ready July 26th. |
| 22 The Bride of an Actor. By the author of "Alone in the World," etc., etc. | 54 One Woman's Heart; or, SAVED FROM THE STREET. By George S. Kalma. | 90 The Author's Daughter. By Mary Howitt. Ready August 2d. |
| 23 Leap Year; or, WHY SHE PROPOSED. By Sara Claxton. | 55 She Did Not Love Him; or, STOOPIG TO CONQUER. By Arabella Southworth. | 91 The Jilt. By Charles Reade. August 9th. |
| 24 Her Face Was Her Fortune. By Eleanor Blaine. | 56 Love-Mad; or, BETROTHED, MARRIED, DIVORCED AND —. By W. M. Turner, M. D. | 92 Eileen Alanna; or, THE DAWNING OF THE DAY. By Dennis O'Sullivan. Ready Aug. 16. |
| 25 Only a Schoolmistress; or, HER UNTOLD SECRET. By Arabella Southworth. | 57 A Brave Girl. By Alice Fleming. | 93 Love's Victory. By Farjeon. August 22. |
| 26 Without a Heart. By P. Ingraham. | 58 The Ebon Mask. By Mary R. Crowell. | 94 The Quiet Heart. By Mrs. Oliphant. Ready August 30th. |
| 27 Was She a Coquette; or, A STRANGE COURTSHIP. By Henrietta Thackeray. | 59 A Widow's Wiles. Rachel Bernhardt. | |
| 28 Sybil Chase; or, THE GAMBLER'S WIFE. By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. | 60 Cecil's Deceit. By Jennie Davis Burton. | |
| 29 For Her Dear Sake. By Sara Claxton. | 61 A Wicked Heart. By Sara Claxton. | |
| 30 The Bouquet Girl; or, A MILLION OF MONEY. By Aggie Penn. | 62 The Maniac Bride. By M. Blount. | |
| 31 A Mad Marriage. By Mary A. Denison. | 63 The Creole Sisters. By Anna E. Porter. | |
| 32 Miriana, the Prima Donna; or, ROSES AND LILIES. By A. Southworth. | 64 What Jealousy Did; or, THE HEIR OF WORSLEY GRANGE. By Alice Fleming. | |
| | 65 The Wife's Secret. By Col. Juan Lewis. | |
| | 66 A Brother's Sin. By Rachel Bernhardt. | |
| | 67 Forbidden Hans. Arabella Southworth. | |
| | 68 Weavers and Weir. By M. E. Braddon. | |

A new issue every week.

THE WAVERLEY LIBRARY is for sale by all Newsdealers, five cents per copy, or sent by mail on receipt of six cents each.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William street, New York.